

In a Field of his own for 30 years

Simon Hoggart

There was not, at first, much applause. Tories were suspicious. Labour, apart from the starry-eyed zealots, were even more so.

He began to get a few "yurr yurrs" with lines about helping the poorest pensioners

He even tried to imply that Mr Field was some kind of crazed, party-political slave, driven by Labour Party dogma, which in its way is as foolish as it would be to say: "These pop singers, they're all sex-mad drug addicts. Look at that Cliff Richard."

Last words Stephen heard

David Pallister

boys li for qu

ved ns and

Arrested: Mitchell Johnson, left, and Andrew Golden

Massacre boys lived for guns and violence

Clinton's adorning army toughs it out on the mean streets

rain last night, dreaming of playing Cathy to Sir Cliff Richard's Heathcliff. Adoring fans pitched camp outside the Royal Albert Hall in London yesterday, three days before tick-ans of the 57-year-old finger are taking no chances. When tickets go on sale at 9am on Sunday, they will be at the front of the queue.

As the wind blew colder,

Linda Modler, also 24, from Copenhagen, said, "We've seen him dozens of ing to spend £210 each on tickets to six of the 20 planned shows. They were forced to travel to London to buy tickets after the organisers limited the numbers to six per person. Shirley Downton, 42, who

There was no jealousy among the cold and shivering Living Dolls. "You meet other fans and make friends," Shirley explained.

It's no summer holiday as Sir Cliff's adoring army toughs it out on the mean streets

Clare Longrigg

Richard's Heathcliff.
Adoring fans pitched camp outside the Royal Albert Hall in London yesterday, three days before tickets go on sale for the singer's 40th anniversary

chances. When tickets go on sale at 9am on Sunday, they will be at the front of the queue.

he fans kept each other cheerful and shared coffee.

Linda Modler, also 24, from Copenhagen, said, "We've seen him dozens of times, and this is the eighth !

anned shows. They were forced to travel to London to buy tickets after the organisers limited the numbers to six per person.

had travelled from the Isle

There was no jealousy among the cold and shivering Living Dolls. "You meet other fans and—"

Free processor upgrade.

- DELL DIMENSION™ XPS D300MT
- INTEL PENTIUM® III PROCESSOR 744MHz 300MHz
- INTEL 440LX AGP-set
- 64MB SDRAM
- 6.4GB ATA-33 HARD DRIVE
- DIAMOND PERMEDIA II 8MB AGP VIDEO CARD
- 17" COLOUR SVGA MONITOR
- (0.28 DOT PITCH, 15.9" VIEWABLE AREA)
- 3 PCI, 1 ISA, 1 PC/ISA SHARED
- AND 1 AGP EXPANSION SLOTS
- 14/32X CD-ROM DRIVE
- YAMAHA XG SOFTWARE WAVEABLE SAMPLE
- AND ALTEC LANSING ACS 295 SPEAKERS
- OMEGA ZIP DRIVE AND 3X100MB CARTRIDGES
- US ROBOTICS 56kb/s MODEM
- MINI-TOWER CHASSIS
- WINDOWS 95 & MICROSOFT® OFFICE 97
- SMALL BUSINESS EDITION

£1,379 (£1,655.58)

- DELL DIMENSION XPS D2666 MT
- INTEL PENTIUM III PROCESSOR 333MHz 2666MHz
 - INTEL 4484X AGP-Set
 - 64MB SDRAM
 - 512KB INTERNAL CACHE
 - 4.36GB ATA-33 HARD DRIVE
 - STD VIDEO • NVIDIA AGP VIDEO WITH 4MB SGRAM VIDEO MEMORY
 - 17" COLOUR SVGA MONITOR (0.28 DOT PITCH, 15.9" VIEWABLE AREA)
 - 3 PC, 1 ISA, 1 PC/ISA SHARED AND 1 AGP EXPANSION SLOTS
 - 14/32X CD-ROM DRIVE
 - YAMAHA XG SOFTWARES WAVETABLE SOUND AND ALTEC LANSING ACS 90 SPEAKERS
 - US ROBOTICS 56Kbps MODEM
 - MINI-TOWER CLASSIS
 - WINDOWS 95 & MICROSOFT OFFICE 97
- SMALL BUSINESS EDITION

£1,179 (£1,420.58)

Dell always bring you the latest, most desirable technology at great prices. And these two powerful Pentium® II processor-based systems are no exception. For a limited period only they come with a FREE processor upgrade. Just look at the specifications, and then call the world's largest direct PC manufacturer*.

Tempted? Bet you won't be able to resist for long.

TALK DIRECT TO THE NUMBER
0870 152466
BETWEEN 9AM & 5PM WEEKDAYS, 9AM TO 4PM SAT, 10AM TO 5PM SUN
To order online 24 hours: www.dell.com

Dell

TALK DIRECT TO THE NUMBER ONE
0870 1524681
BETWEEN 9AM & 5PM WEDNESDAY, 9AM TO 4PM SAT, 10AM TO 5PM SUNDAY
To order online 24 hours: www.dell.com/uk

DELL®

DeL and the DeL logo are registered trademarks and DeL Consumer is a trademark of DeL Consumer Corporation. The Intel Inside logo and Pentium are registered trademarks and MMX is a trademark of Intel Corporation. Microsoft and Windows are registered trademarks and Office 95 is a trademark of the Microsoft Corporation. Delivery at $20 (US$25 and $40) is just an estimate. Prices are available subject to stock. Full details available on request. Prices correct at time of publication. The photographic product may not always match the specifications in this advert. Prices quoted refer to specifications discrepancies only. The prices listed reflect the information available at the time of going to press. Prices change constantly. All prices and specifications are subject to change without prior notice or obligation. Offer supplied while stocks last. MSRP. Microsoft Office software reference units are supplied on CD in compressed format for DeL Consumer PC's. DeL mouse and keyboard included. DeL Product of the Month! Mouse Mouse Mouse! DeL Product DeL DeL DeL. Offer available for a limited period only. DeL areas and combinations of color and

CLYDE 155

fashion
ext's

▶ Gladys revolt
his boy C

Francisco Arroyo, seven, undergoes dolphin therapy with Federico Quiroz in Mexico City. Play in the pool is used as a reward

Miami dolphins help mute British boy to speak

Sarah Boseley
Health Correspondent

An eight-year-old boy who has been mute from birth has said his first words after swimming with dolphins at a therapy centre in Miami, Florida.

Nikki Brice, from Weston-super-Mare, Somerset, has always had the physical ability to speak, but because of his hyperactivity and short attention span, possibly caused by oxygen deprivation at birth, he has never learned to use it.

Standard techniques used in Britain failed. In desperation, his mother took him to the Dolphin Human Therapy Center in Miami, where he received conventional speech-language therapy, but was rewarded by play in the pool with the dolphins. Within days, Nikki had spoken.

"It is a dream come true," said his mother, Tabitha Brice, who raised £10,500 for the treatment.

David Nathanson, who has been treating Nikki, said he had helped children with a range of disorders, from attention deficit problems to cerebral palsy.

"Underlying the difficulties, particularly with learning and motivation, is an inability to attend for a period of time," Dr Nathanson said.

Devising his therapy, he looked at "what grabs the kids", he said. Research and clinical experience told him it was music, warm water and friendly animals, so he set up shop with the eight dolphins in Miami's Seaquarium.

He motivates the children to concentrate and work on their problems with the promise of a swim.

"They have to do certain things on the dock in order to get the reward of the dolphin," he said. "Take a child like Nikki who is quite hyperactive and has a short attention span. He didn't look at things for more than a minute. Now we have him right on points for a 40 minute session."

The boy's first word showed how much the dolphin sessions mattered to him. "We hadn't been there long," said his mother, "when Nikki was told to get out of the water at the end of a dolphin swimming session and he stood very quietly at the side of the tank."

"He must have thought that he wasn't going to be allowed to go swimming with the dolphins again because he suddenly pointed at the water and said: 'In'."

"We all just stood there in shock because it was so unexpected, but once we got over it we quickly told him that he could go in again and he soon cheered up."

He is now beginning to pick up other words, like "please". According to Dr Nathanson, the children gain in confidence and motivation when they succeed in breaking through the first barrier. When they go home after two or three weeks, they take a video of them swimming with the dolphins, which is played as a reward and a reminder of what they have achieved.

Mrs Brice is overwhelmed by the progress Nikki has made. She said: "There is something magical that happens between children and dolphins, something that I don't think we will ever fully understand."

Tilt faces calls to quit after citing asphyxia research

Anger at gaffe over black's jail death

Sarah Hall

THE director general of the prison service faced calls for his resignation last night after he claimed physiological differences meant black people were more likely to suffocate when restrained by warders than those who were white.

Richard Tilt's comments came after an inquest ruled that Alton Manning, 33 — the third black man to die in prison while under restraint between October and December, 1995 — was unlawfully killed at the privately-run Blackhurst jail, near Redditch, Worcestershire, in December, 1995, after being put in a neck hold in contravention of prison service regulations.

Seven warders were suspended after the verdict, pending a decision by the Crown Prosecution Service whether or not to bring charges.

Following the verdict, at Kidderminster on Wednesday, Mr Tilt told BBC2's Newsnight programme that six of the seven people who had died in prisons while being restrained since 1992 were black, with the seventh being of mixed race.

That had prompted prison service research which had shown that "Afro-Caribbean people are more likely to suffer positional asphyxia than whites. That's the evidence that seems to be emerging, not just in this country but in other countries as well."

Yesterday, the prison ser-

'Afro-Caribbean people are more likely to suffer positional asphyxia than whites'

Richard Tilt, left

vice said that Mr Tilt was "greatly concerned at any upset his comments may have inadvertently caused". The research, conducted by a Home Office director of health care into an unspecified number of deaths, was "based around the prevalence of the inherited sickle cell condition among Afro-Caribbean people. The condition can make people more susceptible to positional asphyxia as a consequence of physical restraint."

The explanation, which drew on the death of Dennis Stevens, a black prisoner whose sickle cell trait was found to have contributed to his dying after being restrained in Dartmoor prison in 1995, failed to assuage Labour's Tottenham MP, Bernie Grant, who called to see the evidence. Nor did it satisfy the chairman of the Birmingham racial monitoring unit Maxie Hayes.

Mr Hayes, organiser of the Alton Manning Justice Campaign, said: "I would suggest this man resign."

"Comments like this merely perpetuate negative stereotypes about black people — and the worrying thing is he is in such a position of authority."

The pressure group Inquest accused Mr Tilt of being "racist and grossly offensive".

The inquest jury, which reached a unanimous verdict in 3½ hours, heard that Manning, from Birmingham, died after six warders carried him horizontally for 40 yards, while a seventh held his neck in a vice-like grip between his forearms, until blood gushed from Mr Manning's mouth.

Nat Carey, a Home Office pathologist, who is conducting research into positional asphyxia, accused the prison service of "hiding behind its own research which I suspect has no substance."

Big brained mammals with history of service to man

A DOLPHIN brain weighs 5lb. A human brain weighs 3lb. People have speculated that dolphins might be profound as well as just deep.

Dolphins showed their worth to humans early on: they appear on coins in Corinth in 415 BC.

A dolphin, Pelorus Jack.

used to pilot ships through Marlborough Sound in New Zealand 90 years ago

Wild dolphins have spontaneously appeared as tourist attractions — from Dingle in Ireland to Opononi in New Zealand.

US military scientists tried to use dolphins with bayonets strapped to their noses as guards in Halphong Harbour, Vietnam — to watch for enemy frogmen.

A US navy programme trained dolphins as watchdogs to protect Trident submarines.

Russians at Sevastopol used "dolphin therapy" to cure children of bedwetting.

Public schools warned after equal pay ruling

Annella Gentieman

GOVERNORS of public schools were warned yesterday to review salaries paid to female staff after a gym mistress at an independent girls' school won an equal pay claim. She had been paid less than a man who held the same job at an associated boys' school.

The ruling may affect many other female teachers at independent schools who could see their pay rise as a result of the decision.

Eileen Halloran, aged 50, former PE department head at the fee-charging City of London school for girls, should have been paid the same as the director of PE and sport at the City of London school for boys, an industrial tribunal ruled on Tuesday.

Miss Halloran is expecting compensation of tens of thousands of pounds from her employer, the City of London Corporation, which owns and manages both schools.

Peter Smith, general secretary of Miss Halloran's union, the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, said there were "potentially hundreds" of women in similar positions.

He said: "A significant number of the country's top public schools will need to look as a matter of urgency at what they are paying their teaching staff."

Mr Smith suggested the tribunal decision might also have repercussions in single-sex state schools. "In the teaching profession it is well known that women teachers tend to be paid less than men even though the salary scales are now common," he said.

As head of PE from 1973 to 1985, Miss Halloran's basic salary of £22,500 was more than £7,000 less than that of her opposite number. She was also paid less than two junior PE teachers at the boys' school.

Miss Halloran was one of about 70 teachers at the girls' school — most of them women — being paid on a lower scale. The tribunal rejected the corporation's argument that lower pay in the girls' school merely reflected lower fees — ruling that this was in itself discriminatory.

Ms Halloran, who retired for health reasons in 1995, said she and several colleagues had been demanding pay equality since the 1970s.

"No adequate reason for this disparity in pay was given, but it was common knowledge that the majority of staff at the girls' school were being underpaid in comparison with their male counterparts at the boys' school," she said.

A spokesman for the corporation said it was grappling with the implications of the ruling. "It could affect a number of people, and we may have to evaluate every contract."

Hoddle deserves a little understanding as England stumble from the relief of having qualified to reservations about how well the team might do in the tournament proper.

David Lacey on the pressure and resentment building up around the England coach

Sport98 page 6

Which free pair will you choose?

When you buy any Boots brand spectacles you can choose another pair up to the same value, with standard single vision plastic lenses, absolutely free. Including prescription sunglasses!

If you'd like other lenses, including varifocals or bifocals in your second pair, we'll give you the frames free and the lenses for half the normal price.

See our practice leaflet for full details. But hurry, this offer is for a limited period only.

Not available with non prescription sunglasses, Boots Pioneer Prescription Sunglasses, ready made reading glasses or any other offer.

OPTICIANS

'I was effectively sniffing glue for 22 years. The fumes were so bad in some parts of the factory that we learned to recognise each other by our shoes, so little could be seen above waist height'

— James Fallon, retired fitter

Contractors at work on the site of the British Sidac factory in St Helens, clearing the remains of chemicals tanks

PHOTOGRAPH BY DON MCFARLANE

Workers in 'glue sniffing' factory get £75,000

Award follows 20 years exposure to mix of hazardous chemicals

David Ward

TWO men who developed asthma, memory loss and mood swings after working for more than two decades with noxious chemicals at a plant making Cellophane were yesterday celebrating a £75,000 compensation victory.

"I was effectively sniffing glue for 22 years," said James

Fallon, aged 65. "In the early days the fumes were so bad in some parts of the factory that we learned to recognise each other by our shoes and lower bodies because so little could be seen above waist height."

Mr Fallon and Robert Burrows, aged 70, both worked as fitters at British Sidac at St Helens, Merseyside, which closed in 1982. They came into contact with carbon disulphide, toluene, formaldehyde and phosgene. The company, now based in Wigan, Cumbria, denied liability but settled the claims before a court hearing due in Manchester next month.

"I suspect cases like these are only the tip of the iceberg," said Pauline Chandler of Manchester solicitors Thompsons, who handled the men's claim. "Industrial exposure to solvents has been going on for many years but there are still relatively few identified cases of injury. This is partly because many of the symptoms like mood swings, fatigue, memory impairment and impotence are common in the population at large, and doctors may not recognise a link with work."

Mr Fallon, who claims he wore no masks or protective clothing during his employment from 1965 to 1980, was attracted by high pay levels and often worked seven days a week to boost his income.

"The company told us nothing," he said. "They concentrated on the fire risks because the chemicals were so volatile. The smell was evil and there were times when I was high on a cocktail of different things."

"I suffered constant tiredness and would come home from work and flop — there was no way I could be woken up. It was like being dead."

He also began to develop asthma, but only realised the true threat to his health after seeing a health and safety poster in the 1980s.

"This has taken a chunk out of our lives and I will be on medication for life. I'm very angry but I'm happy with the settlement. I had not intended to break the bank — I just wanted justice and a little recompense."

The British Sidac site was bought by St Helens council, which began a clean-up four years ago. Contractors were brought in to deal with the remains of carbon disulphide and the job will continue for another three months before factory units can be built.

For the company, David Teasdale of solicitors James Chapman, said the two originally made "very substantial claims", including compensation for loss of earnings. "The insurers decided to offer a modest proportion of the potential claim to avoid an expensive trial. They still deny liability."

Greenham leukaemia 'a mystery'

David Fairhall

THE high incidence of childhood leukaemia around the former cruise missile base at Greenham Common, Berkshire, cannot have been caused by a nuclear bomber accident there in 1985, a fresh investigation ordered by the Department of Health has concluded.

The Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment — which was not told about the accident when it first looked into the Greenham leukaemia cluster some years ago — can find no evidence that a nuclear weapon was involved when a US air force B47 bomber caught fire. But its latest report criticises the Ministry of Defence for withholding vital information from its earlier investigation.

Radioactivity around the Berkshire base was predominantly due to natural sources, with a small contribution from atmospheric bomb tests, fallout from the 1986 Chernobyl power station accident, and releases from the nearby atomic weapons establishments at Aldermaston and Burghfield.

Radiation levels at Greenham, both natural and man-made, were lower than in many other parts of the UK. However, the report confirms the earlier finding that there is a "small excess" in the incidence of leukaemia in children aged up to four in West Berkshire.

There was a similar excess in young people in just one of Newbury's electoral wards. Since the leukaemia did not appear to be linked to radiation exposure, the explanation may have to await analysis of national data on the distribution of childhood cancer, as recommended by the 1988 report.

The committee was set up in 1985 to advise the government. In this week's report it castigates the ministry for not disclosing a secret 1981 study by two Aldermaston scientists which suggested that the pattern of radioactivity around Greenham could be traced back to the B47 accident.

Those releasing radioactivity into the environment had a responsibility to inform the committee, and the ministry was not exempt from that. The Aldermaston study only became public knowledge in 1996, when it was leaked by CND. It proved "vital to an understanding of the Greenham Common question", the committee says. Without it, the committee's earlier investigation had to rely on atmospheric discharge data that could only be estimated.

But, "fortunately", the fresh information did not change its overall conclusions.

CND yesterday attacked the secrecy of the Government about nuclear activities.

Dave Knight, CND chairman, said: "We know, for example, that there have been at least 20 incidents involving nuclear weapons since 1960, yet no details are available, on grounds of 'national security'."

Estate agents' dirty deeds

Sally Pook

JUST when you thought you knew how low estate agents were, a new survey confirms that their behaviour routinely extends far beyond your worst nightmares.

Forget the dissembling words and spivish deals, these charm merchants actually have sex in our homes, throw parties in our lounges, size up clients for some carnal entertainment (but only if they look like Elizabeth Hurley or Jennifer Aniston) — and given the opportunity — would consider sex as payment in kind for selling a property.

More bizarrely, one in 10 estate agents have made themselves "at home" in a property — which may include anything from eating a bag of crisps to having "sex on their own", according to the researchers.

A quarter admitted to having sex in the houses they were selling, 5 per cent have thrown a party in a property and 14 per cent would accept sex with a prospective client, according to the survey. Less surprisingly, perhaps, two out of three said they would persuade their own grandmother to sell her house against her will, while more than half believe that most of their profession lie to make a sale.

"It is quite a shocker. I was not expecting results like this — but then estate agents never cease to amaze me," said Andy Clerkson, editor of Stuff, a men's consumer magazine which commissioned the survey.

"What concerns me most is that these guys seem almost blasé about it, as if it is normal behaviour."

"We have not offered any advice to readers on how to spot an estate agent who is not going to throw a party in their beloved house, but evidently people need to be diligent about who they are leaving their keys with."

Nearly 1,000 estate agents across Britain took part in the survey, which was conducted by the market research company NSM. They reveal themselves to be overwhelmingly Tory — 61 per cent vote Conservative — they are married but inclined to infidelity and nearly half earn more than £30,000 a year. The majority own a BMW but dream of driving a Ferrari and more than two thirds smoke and gamble.

The majority, 67 per cent, spend up to £350 on their pin-striped suits and their favourite hands are Simply Red and Oasis. Ten per cent admitted having made themselves "at home" in a property.

Hugh Dunsmore-Hardy, chief executive of the National Association of Estate Agents, gave a withering response. "We do not believe this survey is a true representation of professional estate agents in the UK."

"We have asked for evidence on how the survey was undertaken and have been given no answers. We therefore leave it to the public to draw their own conclusions."

Schoolgirl mothers

Teen mags 'fight pregnancies'

Tessa Jowell... 'a need to be less sniggering about sex'

Sarah Boscley Health Correspondent

TEEN magazines, which came under heavy fire from MPs two years ago for carrying sexually explicit articles, are to be enlisted as a weapon in the fight to stem the rise in teenage pregnancies.

Yesterday the Health Minister, Tessa Jowell, revealed that she had held meetings with the heavily criticised editors of magazines like Sugar, Bliss and Just Seventeen. They "have an important role to play in communicating with young people in their formative years," she told the Family Planning Association national conference.

"I was touched by the letters they showed me from teenagers. Each one was a poignant and confused cry for help. It is absolutely clear that many girls become pregnant through sheer ignorance. We need to create a climate where young people understand the consequences of their actions and their relationships."

Peter Luff, Conservative MP for Mid Worcestershire, attacked the teen magazines in 1996 for their "squalid titillation, salaciousness and smut" after he found his 10-year-old daughter reading one. He introduced a bill in the House of Commons to try to force them to carry warnings on sexually explicit material. He won backing from the then Home Office minister, Tom Sackville, who told the Commons some magazines were using sex and exploiting the innocence of young people to make money. The publishers and retailers of the magazines agreed to set up a working party to draw up a code of conduct.

Ms Jowell said some children did not feel able to talk to their parents, teachers or other authorities about sex. She wanted to reach children before they were sexually active. Teen magazines were one route, but she also intended to work with Estelle Morris in the Department for Education and Employment to launch a national advisory group on personal, social and health education in schools.

"I think an important focus of that group will be to help pupils understand what it means to have children... so they do not have children while they themselves are children."

She wanted boys to be as aware of their responsibilities as girls, and for both to be able to talk to their parents about sex. "That means cultural change. It means a society where we are more open about sex, less sniggering," she said.

Girls' poignant cries for help

Letters in teen magazines:

"I'm only 14 years old and I have this problem about sex. If you sleep with a guy and don't have sex, can you get pregnant? And when you kiss a guy, I mean not just a kiss, but kissing with a guy for quite a long time, can you get pregnant too? All my friends say if you have sex with a guy, you stand a chance of getting pregnant. Is this true?"

"ABOUT a month ago me and my boyfriend had sex and I'm only 15. Not long ago did I find out that I was pregnant. I haven't told anyone because I'm so scared. My boyfriend doesn't know either. Please help. I don't know what to do."

Some of the magazines being recruited by the Government to help stem the rise in teenage pregnancies

News in brief

Murder suspect freed by police

A MAN arrested in connection with the murder of schoolgirl Kate Bushell was released last night, a spokeswoman for Devon and Cornwall police said. He had been questioned at Exeter since Wednesday. The 14-year-old had her throat slashed while walking a neighbour's dog near her home on the outskirts of the city in November. Police ordered DNA tests on all men living in a half-mile radius of the scene.

PC faces sack over slap

A POLICEMAN faces the sack after slapping a schoolboy. PC Roger Hateley, aged 51, was convicted at Wolverhampton magistrates court yesterday of common assault after an incident at a school in Castle Bromwich, Birmingham. He was fined £250 with £400 costs and ordered to pay the boy, who cannot be named, £30 compensation. Hateley had gone to the school to investigate a burglary, and claimed the slap had been an accident. He had wanted to grab the boy by the scruff of the neck.

Assembly gag lifted

AN UNPRECEDENTED attempt to gag elected representatives was abandoned by the Government yesterday, when it dropped its demand that members of the Welsh Assembly should be bound by the Official Secrets Act. Peter Hain, the Welsh minister, announced the climb-down during a Commons debate on the Government of Wales Bill. Originally, all 60 assembly members would have faced prosecution for disclosing information about a range of issues, including European Union grants or Ministry of Defence activities in Wales. Only members of the proposed Welsh executive council will now be covered by the act. — Richard Norton-Taylor

Bogus don discharged

OXFORD magistrates gave a conditional discharge of philosophy to a man who passed himself off as a doctor who has a first-class degree in computer science from another university, had an earlier hearing admitted obtaining property by deception and making a false instrument — an Oxford membership card he forged while employed in the admissions office, and with which he was able to obtain a room in Worcester College and use university computers.

Saving the birds - Saving the future

Look!

3 months FREE membership of the RSPB

OUR wonderful birdlife and countryside need protecting. Help by joining the RSPB, and using the form below you'll get all these superb benefits too:

- Your first 3 months membership absolutely FREE
- FREE entry to over 100 beautiful RSPB nature reserves throughout the UK
- Birds, the RSPB's quarterly 96 page award-winning colour magazine
- Pay by convenient quarterly instalments

And when you join, you'll know you're helping to protect our beautiful natural heritage for generations to come.

Plus this FREE video

You'll receive this 85 minute BBC/RSPB Videoguide to British Garden Birds narrated by Sir David Attenborough if you reply within 28 days.

ALL THIS FROM JUST £5.75 A QUARTER!

Post To: RSPB, FREEPOST, Sandy, Beds SG19 2ER.

YES! I would like to join the RSPB FREE for 3 months and have completed the Direct Debit form (approx. 10 pence) to continue my membership after the 3 month free period. I can cancel the Direct Debit instruction at any time.

☐ I am replying within 28 days and claim my FREE Videoguide to British Garden Birds.

Name (BLOCK CAPITALS PLEASE) ABR588

Address _____

Postcode _____

Bank account to be debited _____

CHOOSE: ☐ Single membership £5.75 a quarter
☐ Family membership £10.00 a quarter for two adults and all children under 16 at one address. (Please attach name and date of birth of each child)

ACTUAL NUMBER _____

DATE _____

The RSPB is the charity which takes action for wild birds and the environment

155

Appeal for lessons in citizenship

Vivak Chaudhary
Education Correspondent

Main points

LESSONS on how to be a good citizen should form part of the national curriculum to combat "apathy, ignorance and cynicism" about public life, a report on democracy and citizenship in schools recommended yesterday.

The report also concedes, though, that safeguards have to be put in place to prevent the lessons from being used to indoctrinate pupils.

According to the interim report of the Advisory Group on Education for Citizenship and Teaching of Democracy in Schools, a whole generation of youngsters have become alienated and a "change in the political culture of this country is needed."

The working group which compiled the work was led by Bernard Crick of the University of London.

A full report is due to be published in July.

The report recommends teaching children social and moral behaviour and how to become more involved in their communities. It identifies three key strands to effective citizenship: social and moral responsibility, community involvement and political literacy.

Welcoming the report, David Blunkett, the Education Secretary, said: "The key strands are essential to responsible adult life in a modern democracy. Professor Crick's recommendations would, of course, leave the detail of citizenship education to individual schools."

The Government has always made clear that any recommendations will respect the existing place of RE (religious education) in the curriculum and in no way supersede or replace this.

The report claims that nearly one in three of those

- Children should be taught about socially and morally responsible behaviour.
- They need to learn about becoming helpfully involved in the life of the community, and encouraged to do voluntary work.
- There needs to be more instruction on how to make oneself effective in public life, including knowledge about conflict resolution.
- Citizenship education should take up no more than five per cent of lesson time but should be included in existing subjects.

aged 18-24 had no plans to vote in last year's general election. It points to greater interest among young voters in single issue pressure groups, particularly green ones.

The report is unlikely to appease education officials who are concerned that citizenship lessons could be manipulated by a future administration to indoctrinate children.

Last week, Patrick Tobin, chairman of the Headmasters' Conference of Independent Schools said that the danger would be all the greater if citizenship education were to become a substitute for Christianity in schools.

The report recommends the formation of a working group to examine the details of citizenship lessons. It also states that given the sensitivity over the issue, further guidance on areas surrounding citizenship will be given in the publication of the final report.

A separate group, the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, is also due to give its views on the teaching of citizenship and democracy later this year.

A pair of nautiluses at Weymouth sea life centre. Some 600 million years ago they were found off Dorset, but are now found only in the warm waters of the Pacific. PHOTOGRAPH: ROGER BAUMER

Stepfather insists he did not kill 9-year-old Zoe

Geoffrey Gibbs

ARMED driver Miles Evans took to the witness box at Bristol crown court yesterday to deny involvement in the murder of his nine-year-old stepdaughter, Zoe, whose body was found on a Wiltshire hillside six weeks after she went missing from their home in Warrminster.

Zoe Evans was suffocated when the small crop top she had been wearing was stuffed in her mouth. She had also inhaled blood after her nose was broken by a severe blow.

Her naked body was hurried head first in a badger's sett on Battlesbury Hill less than a mile from her home.

Asked by defence counsel Alan Jenkins QC whether he had killed Zoe or had had any part in taking her to Battlesbury Hill, Evans replied: "No I didn't."

He said he had not interfered with Zoe sexually nor had he been about to on the night she disappeared.

The Crown alleges that Evans, a 24-year-old Royal Logistics Corps driver who has served in Northern Ireland and Bosnia, murdered Zoe after taking her at night from the family's home on January 11 last year.

The prosecution has told the jury that he dropped two "crucial" pieces of evidence on his way to Battlesbury Hill — a blue No Fear T-shirt found in a copse 100 yards from the house, and a pair of Zoe's knickers. Both were stained with the dead girl's blood.

Cross-examined by Nigel Pascoe QC, prosecuting, Evans said he was not suggesting his wife, Paula, had killed Zoe.

He said that with her 10th birthday approaching, Zoe had everything to look forward to and that there was no reason why she should want to run away from home. He said she did not like the dark and would have been terrified when taken from the house on the night she died.

Mr Pascoe suggested to Evans that during a taped police interview after his arrest — played in court yesterday — he "very nearly admitted" striking Zoe. "Are we dealing here with something that went dreadfully wrong that night?" he asked.

Evans said: "I don't know what happened that night. I didn't do anything to Zoe."

Mr Pascoe said that the T-shirt could only have left the house if Zoe or someone in the house was wearing it or carrying it.

"Whoever left with the shirt must have left with Zoe and against her will. This parent must have made quite sure that little Zoe didn't call out and must have had a hand over her mouth."

He said that if a random perverser had killed the child, he would have felt no need to bury her.

The trial continues.

Solicitors face more complaints

Claire Dyer
Legal Correspondent

COMPLAINTS against solicitors have rocketed, forcing the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors, the profession's regulatory body, to draft an extra staff.

Complaints are up 30 per cent on the same period last year, and are now running at about 35,000 a year against a profession of only around 75,000. The 300-strong OSS is about to advertise for 30 temporary caseworkers and 10 administrative staff to help clear a backlog built up since last August.

The OSS was launched 18 months ago by the Law Society to replace the discredited Solicitors Complaints Bureau and restore public confidence in the system for regulating solicitors. Its launch followed warnings by the then legal services ombudsman, Michael Barnes, that the profession had only one more chance to get its house in order.

It set up new systems to improve efficiency and targets for speedier responses to phone calls and letters. But it has been forced to acknowledge in letters to complainants that it is failing to meet targets for clearing up the backlog.

Arnold Rosen, a solicitor practising in London's West

End, said that the office was wasting time and effort on trivial complaints. The OSS took on a complaint against him by a justice's clerk — senior legal adviser to magistrates — after a policeman overheard him call a woman clerk a "silly cow" in a private conversation with a client at a magistrates court.

Mr Rosen argues that the office should have rejected the complaint since the conversation was private, and the magistrates were not in court. But not only did the OSS investigate the complaint, it entered into negotiations over his offer to send the woman clerk a bunch of flowers.

"To my astonishment, the OSS engaged in a counter-offer," he writes in today's New Law Journal. "Having had conversations with the clerk to the justices, they informed me that if I were to send the flowers first, the clerk might withdraw the complaint."

"Alas, my lifetime habits as a litigation lawyer die hard. I feared that if my bouquet were not sufficiently large or fragrant, proceedings might continue. In short, I wanted the complaint withdrawn as a pre-condition to the letters delivery. After all, who was to say that the lady would accept daffodils when she might have been anticipating red roses?"

Martin Mears, a former Law Society president and a critic of the OSS, said: "They have been sending out standard form letters saying it will be 12 weeks before a caseworker will even look at your complaint."

"One of the reasons they cannot deal with the workload is they are dealing with idiosyncrasies of this kind." The OSS said the letters referred to the backlog of cases before a new streamlined system was set up in January. "Most complaints received since January are being actioned within a couple of weeks." The extra staff would be allocated to cases dating back before the introduction of the new system.

Peer seeks to lift bar on Catholics

Michael White
Political Editor

AFRESH attempt to enable Catholics and other non-Anglicans to become prime minister, lord chancellor or even monarch will be launched in the Lords today — by a Presbyterian peer from Northern Ireland.

Lord Alderdice, leader of the Alliance Party in the province, will ask peers to clarify the law regarding the lord chancellorship, held by Lord Irvine, a member of the establishment Church of Scotland, and theoretically not open to members of the Jewish and other faiths.

Lord Alderdice will also introduce a separate bill to eliminate residual prejudice against non-Anglicans becoming prime minister. It lingers because 18th century legislation makes it an offence for anyone not a member of the established Church of England to give the Crown advice on ecclesiastical appointments — which prime ministers routinely do when Anglican hispanics become vacant.

Lord Alderdice stressed last night that he embarked on his three-part plan well before it emerged that Tony Blair, whose wife and children are Catholics, has been worshipped alone at Westminster Cathedral. Aides emphatically deny that he intends to convert.

In his drive to extirpate the remains of bias against Catholicism, Lord Alderdice also wants to repeal the section of the 1702 Act of Settlement which bans Catholics from the throne and from royal marriages.

He planned to raise this, the third of his initiatives, today. But it was withdrawn after the peer, who sits in the Lords with the Liberal Democrats, was advised that too few potentially hostile lords would be absent on a Friday. He intends to return to the issue.

Lord Irvine has made clear his opposition to the Alderdice bill concerning his office, which has reached the committee stage. He calls it "well-intentioned, but unnecessary" and claims that it could detract from the lord chancellor's powers.

As things stand, Catholics can be lord chancellor. Margaret Thatcher had the ban repealed in the 1980s in order to make Lord Rawlinson lord chancellor — although she then changed her mind about the appointment. The law had already been changed in the 1870s to allow Jews to hold the post — as Sir Rufus Isaacs, Lord Reading, did in the 1920s — but that law was repealed accidentally in the 1990s.

Sell-off fears blamed for spate of post staff strikes

Seamus Milne
Labour Editor

POSTAL workers' leaders yesterday blamed a spate of strikes in four English cities on uncertainty within the Post Office created by the threat of privatisation.

Thousands of postal workers staged unofficial walkouts in Liverpool and London yesterday, while official strikes were held in Oxford last night and Birmingham earlier this week.

In Liverpool, post boxes were sealed as unofficial action spread in protest at plans to transfer work out of the city, while several London sorting offices were struckbound after staff walked out of the Willesden depot in support of a worker suspended for insubordination. A dispute about overtime pay flared at the north London Mount Pleasant sorting office.

The Birmingham dispute is over staffing. The Oxford strike in protest against a canteen closure.

Derek Hodgson, joint general secretary of the Communication Workers' Union, said the poor industrial relations in the Post Office were a "mirror of the uncertainty that surrounds the entire business, including the latest media reports that Government could still be considering some form of privatisation."

Powerhouse UK, displaying works by 50 top British designers, receives its finishing touches. The exhibition is being held in a 25ft high inflatable structure on Horse Guards Parade and will be opened next Friday by Tony Blair to coincide with a Europe-Asia business conference. PHOTOGRAPH: GRAHAM TURNER

Women bishops divide Anglican event

Madeline Bunting
Religious Affairs Editor

THE Lambeth Conference gathering of Anglican bishops in Canterbury this summer is likely to be dogged by controversy over the presence of 11 women bishops.

Two bishops announced they will boycott the event and another 50 stipulated conditions for attendance. There will be no group photograph of the episcopacy — normally a ritual of Lambeth Conferences, which are held every decade — and there will be no "great robe" gatherings, Lambeth Palace has assured bishops who object to ordination of women.

The opening procession into Canterbury Cathedral will be low key, says David Long, the conference manager, according to today's Church Times. He added that the Archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey, was anxious to be "open and hospitable" to all bishops, whatever their views.

Leading the protest which threatens to wreck the chances of the Anglican Communion presenting a united front are two British bishops, the Rt Rev Noel Jones, Bishop of Sodor and Man and the Rt Rev Eric Kemp, Bishop of Chichester. Bishop Jones has said he will attend no service, Bible study or working group in which a woman bishop is taking part.

Joining the protest are the bishops of Singapore, Zululand, Tanganyika, Victoria, Port Worth, Kilimanjaro, Ballarat, the Windward Islands and Papua New Guinea. Initially, some of those were not going to attend the three-week conference being held at the University of Kent in July and August. Two Anglo-Catholic traditionalist separatist bishops in Madagascar, Rt Rev Keith Benzeles of Antiranana and Rt Rev Donald Smith of Toamasina, are boycotting the event entirely. This controversy follows moves on the homosexuality issue by both advocates and opponents in the Anglican Communion, in an attempt to put the question of homosexual rights on the Lambeth Conference agenda.

There are 11 women bishops in the Anglican Communion — two from Canada, one from New Zealand and the rest from the United States — all consecrated since the last conference in 1988.

"It would be an absolute tragedy for the Anglican Communion if bishops stayed away because an Anglican province had decided it was right before God to consecrate women bishops. These decisions are not taken lightly, hnt with an enormous amount of prayer," said Elaine Storkey, director of the Institute of Contemporary Christianity, and a conference speaker.

Bishop Jones — as president of the International Bishops' Conference on Faith and Order, which has led the international protest against women bishops — is effectively setting up a conference inside a conference, with the option of separate services, "if need be," by renting alternative premises. A nearby parish church is to be made available to bishops wanting to celebrate their Eucharist away from the conference and any women bishops.

'Cuckoo' fostering peril

Sarah Beechey
Health Correspondent

FOSTER children can sometimes act as cuckoos in the family nest, doing their best trying to push out natural siblings and demanding the parents' attention for themselves, the annual conference of the British Psychological Society in Brighton heard yesterday.

Hostility between natural children and foster children in a family is one of the reasons why placements break down, said Deborah Browne, of the Department of Applied Psychology, University of Cork, who interviewed foster parents and social workers involved in 127 placements. Placing foster children where the natural siblings are older leads to greater success, she believes.

When siblings are in conflict, those related by birth show some competition towards each other. That is not the case when they have different parents, Ms Browne said. The natural children can resent the newcomer, who is demanding and obtaining more attention from the foster parents because of his or her history and behaviour.

"These children can probably be justifiably expected to feel frustrated and angry at the attention a non-related child is getting from their parents."

"This 'cuckoo' effect seems to be most destructive when children are fostered in families with younger children or children within three years of the age of the foster child."

Once foster parents realised what was going on, their unhappiness led to the end of the placement. "It would appear foster parents are not willing to sustain a placement if they feel their own children are being threatened in any way."

Hodde deserves a little understanding as England stumble from the relief of having qualified to reservations about how well the team might do in the tournament proper.
David Lacey on the pressure and resentment building up around the England coach

Sport98 page 6

Playground shootings

Her first instinct was to protect her pupils and it cost Shannon Wright (left) her life. Drummond Ayres reports from Jonesboro

'She always looked out for us'

SHANNON WRIGHT was calling her class to order after the dinner break at Westside school when the fire alarm sounded. Thinking it just another drill, she calmly ushered her pupils into the playground.

Then the shooting started. Children were being cut down by a fusillade of bullets fired by two schoolmates hidden in nearby woods.

Ms Wright acted instinctively. Spotting one of the boys taking aim at 12-year-old Emma Pittman, the teacher jumped into the line of fire, suffering fatal wounds to the chest and abdomen. Emma was saved.

"I think Ms Wright saw that bullet coming," said Emma later. "She grabbed me by the shoulders and pushed me out of the way. I feel so sorry for her."

Amber Vanover, a classmate, said: "This guy was aiming at Emma. He was fixing to shoot her and Ms Wright moved in front of her. She got shot. She did. I would have."

Ms Wright died in hospital on Tuesday night. There has not been much from which to take hope in Jonesboro this week, but many residents, including Lula Jones, the manager of the school canteen, found solace in Ms Wright's bravery. "She would do that, without a doubt," Ms Jones said of her friend, who was 32.

Dennis and Pat Golden leave the county sheriff's department flanked by police. Their son Andrew, aged 11, is accused with his cousin of multiple murder. PHOTOGRAPH: MIKE WINTROATH

Ms Wright leaves behind a 2-year-old son, Zane, and a husband, Mitchell.

Diane Hattenhauer, a former pupil, remembered Ms Wright as "always kind and caring". But most of all, she remembered her as a teacher "who always looked out for us".

Emma's mother, Susan, suggested the city should give Ms Wright an award for heroism. "She didn't think of herself. She thought of the children."

According to Mr Wright, his wife had dreamt of being a teacher at Westside since childhood, when her idea of playing with her little brother was to write out a lesson plan and give him homework.

She had taught both of the boys arrested and charged after the shooting. But, said her husband, she never criticised either, nor any other pupils, even the most troublesome.

"She never came home and talked bad about any of her kids. She just always enjoyed working with kids and helping kids."

Last week the couple took Zane to Disney World in Florida. Before heading home, Ms Wright took time to send postcards to some of her students.

When asked what he thought should happen to the boys — aged 11 and 13 — if they are found guilty of multiple murder, Mr Wright replied: "Well, they are children. But it was pretty much premeditated. So I think they should spend the rest of their lives in prison. But we all know that's just not going to happen."

Under Arkansas law, the boys, if tried as juveniles, could be free on their 18th birthdays. — New York Times.

● A 4-year-old boy with a fascination for firearms has been caught for a second time with a loaded gun at a nursery in Cleveland, Ohio. A staff member found the 5mm handgun in a coat pocket. The boy told the police that he took the gun from a shop owned by his guardian's brother.

"He is a bright, attentive, well-cared-for child, but he is absolutely fascinated with guns," said the nursery administrator Catherine Perry.

Banned miners promise to be as good as gold

Prospectors are asking Brazil for a second chance. Alex Bellos in Boa Vista reports FERNANDO Aleluia used to be a rich man. At the height of the northern Brazilian gold rush 10 years ago he owned three houses and a farm with 5,000 chickens.

Now the 56-year-old prospector has only one house left and was forced to sell his last bit of gold, a 60g medal worth $55, last week.

"Life was great here," he said as he took off his necklace and handed it to the gold dealer. "But then they banned gold-mining. Now we are all poor. The only prospecting we do now is at the rubbish dump, looking for food."

Mr Aleluia was one of about 40,000 fortune-seekers who came to Roraima, Brazil's northernmost state, in the early Eighties, making the capital, Boa Vista, the country's fastest growing town. Its tiny airport was reportedly the busiest in the world, as light aircraft flew to and from the gold-rich rainforest.

But the garimpeiros — wildcat miners — blasted the riverbeds and polluted the rivers with mercury, which they used to separate the gold, causing serious environmental damage. The Yanomami Indians, who have lived on the land for 2,000 years, were nearly destroyed, their population plummeting from 20,000 in 1975 to about 9,000.

After intense international pressure, the Brazilian government banned mining in the Yanomami reservation, a territory the size of Portugal, in 1991. Most of the garimpeiros returned to a life of extreme poverty in Boa Vista.

Only a few traders in Rua de Ouro (Gold Street), who once dealt with several "Someone is killed every day because someone else is going hungry — all they can do is mine" ponnds of the precious metal every week, remain. Many now act as pawnbrokers to garimpeiros selling their last possessions.

Edson Bittencourt, sitting in his empty shop, said he has not had a customer for weeks. "It is never going to get better," he said, adding that lawlessness was overtaking the town. "Every day someone is killed because someone else is going hungry. Most of the population here are garimpeiros. They don't have a profession or any education. All they can do is mine."

Another shopkeeper, Adalberto Oliveira, denounced the government's attitude towards the miners. "Garimpeiros are friends of the Indians. We used to give them food and medicine. We didn't give them malaria. It's from there not here. They always died from it but nobody knew."

Most of the garimpeiros still entering the reservation, are cleared out in regular government purges. In January 500 miners were arrested, many of them sick or starving, and another 250 gave themselves up, glad to be spirited out of the jungle. Three planes were seized last week.

Several thousand miners have crossed the border into Venezuela, Guyana and Surinam, where mining is still legal. In Santa Elena, 125 miles away on the Venezuelan border, there are about 20 gold and diamond shops.

Back in Boa Vista, the head of the garimpeiro's union, Crisnel Ramalho, believes the solution is to allow controlled mining, and is supporting a bill drafted by a local congressman to allow mining companies access to reservations currently off limits. "We want to practise our profession with dignity and above board," he said.

Suicide makes history

Joanna Coles in New York

AN ELDERLY woman who died in Oregon on Tuesday after taking a cocktail of lethal drugs became the first person in the United States to commit assisted suicide legally.

Her death was the first since Oregon ratified a law last autumn that allows the terminally ill to kill themselves with doctors' help, provided they are of sound mind and are expected to die within six months.

Though the woman's family did not release her name, they said she had advanced breast cancer and two doctors had told her she had fewer than two months to live.

The advocacy group Oregon Compassion in Dying said a doctor had prescribed drugs which the woman swallowed with a glass of brandy. She died half an hour later with her family by her side.

The family played reporters a tape, made two days before the death, in which the woman said she wanted to end her acute pain. She could not walk and found it difficult to breathe.

"I can't see myself living a few more months like this," she said. "I'm looking forward to it. I will be relieved of all the stress I have."

Opponents of the law, including many Catholics, claimed the Oregon would become a deathly destination for people unable to persuade doctors to help them die elsewhere. But so far there has been no influx of patients.

Oregon's experience is being watched by other states as America's population grows older and more people demand help to die on their own terms.

The Michigan euthanasia advocate Dr Jack Kevorkian, who claims to have helped about 100 people commit suicide, is thought to have been present at two deaths in the past month.

Oregon has published a 91-page book laying out strict guidelines for the medical profession: doctors may only prescribe the fatal dose, they are not allowed to administer it or even hand it to the patient. Patients must have written diagnoses from at least two doctors.

The law was passed in 1994 but challenges held it up for three years. It was ratified last year with strong support.

For Robert's Mum, 100 free minutes of local calls.

Over 300,000 of you have just told us what you want from your phone service.

Price was obviously top of most people's list. So we give our new customers 100 minutes of local evening calls free every month. It gives people extra value at a time they really want it.

In Robert's case it keeps his Mum off his back. As for his Mum, well, it saves her a bit of money.

And our tariffs are also tailored around individuals — we save you money on the type of calls you make the most: local, national or international.

As Britain's new phone, TV and internet provider, we wanted to start off differently. With you.

What can we do for you?
FreeCall 0800 068 8090

<http://www.cwcom.co.uk>

CABLE & WIRELESS

British attention focused on Tony Blair's conversation with the Italian prime minister. But in Europe the question is whether Rupert Murdoch is going through a euro conversion.

Martin Walker warns Europe to watch out

This section page 12

1550 1/10/1998

Toast the new Power Macintosh G3 at your local Apple Reseller

AppleCentres
Scotys Computer Systems	Aberdeen	01224 875737
F H Brown Plc	Barnsley	01226 777110
Scotys Computer Systems	Bellshill	01698 846001
ICM Computer Solutions Plc	Birstall	0800 614581
F H Brown Plc	Blackpool	01253 894800
Western Computer Ltd	Bristol	0117 922 5661
F H Brown Plc	Burnley	01282 833357
AppleCentre Cambridge	Cambridge	01223 247111
ME Electronics	Cambridge	01223 350216
ICM Computer Solutions Plc	Darford	0800 614581
Scotys Computer Systems	Edinburgh	0131 557 5995
Carpe Diem Solutions Ltd	Glasgow	0141 333 9901
Scotys Computer Systems	Glasgow	0141 339 9627
Computercare	Hampton Hill, Middlesex	0181 949 3922
Mela Computers Ltd	High Wycombe	01494 443588
Computercare	Leeds	0113 242 0601
Albion Computers Plc	London, W1N	0171 323 0220
MR Systems	London, N7	0171 700 2121
Colver Graphics Ltd	London, EC1R	0171 833 0888
Trans Plc	London, SW1V	0171 544 1222
AppleCentre Chromasonic	London, NW4	0181 203 8989
Tasha Computers	London, W14	0171 602 9444
London Graphic Systems	London, W10	0181 964 9772
F H Brown Plc	Manchester	0161 661 1099
ICM Computer Solutions Plc	Manchester	0800 614581
ABC Microcore Ltd	Newcastle upon Tyne	0191 268 1162
Aurora UniComp Limited	Newtonabbey, Northern Ireland	01232 848 000
KINGS Group Plc	Nottingham	0115 950 3352
ME Electronics	Oxford	01865 728700
Holdens Computer Services Ltd	Preston	01772 610100
Thames Valley Systems Plc	Reading	0118 950 3500
ME Electronics	Reading	01189 500551
Artworker Ltd	Salisbury, Surrey	01757 773166
Trimac	Sheffield	0114 2724127
ApplePoint Thames Valley	Slough	01753 518866
Blue Chip Systems	Stevenage	01438 746 333
ICM Computer Solutions Plc	Walsall	0800 614581
AppleCentre Warrington	Warrington	01925 444499

Apple Resellers
Mac and More Ltd	Berkhamstead	01442 870300
Euromedia	Bexley, Kent	01322 528 000
Hi-Tec Computer Services	Bradford	01274 626779
Network Professional Ltd	Brighton	01273 748083
Apple Tree Graphics	Bromsgrove	01527 570 535
Electronic Publishing Systems	Camberley, Surrey	01276 609 999
First Temptation Computers Ltd	Canterbury	01227 764455
Datocore Consultants	Chelmsford	01245 261578
Computer Technique Ltd	Chelmsford	01245 257 515
TUSCO Systems	Colchester	01206 765776
Durham Office Systems Ltd	Consett, County Durham	01207 583 978
Mediaspec	East Kilbride, Glasgow	01355 272 500
PCB Media Ltd	Halifax	01422 330066
Axiom (UK) Ltd	Hampton	0181 941 8898
Computer Sense Limited	Hemel Hempstead	01442 252555
Dacorum Graphics	Hemel Hempstead	01442 240833
Definitive Technologies Ltd	High Wycombe	01494 443711
Principal Corporation	Horsham, West Sussex	01403 258 486
Solutions Inc	Hove	01273 889020
Island Computer Systems Ltd	Isle of Wight	01983 821717
The Rack Group	Leeds	0113 246 9820
Core Solutions Limited	Leighton Buzzard	01525 850355
SRS Systems Ltd	London, NW10	0800 731 6198
Inspire Ltd	London, SW18	0181 874 2229
DB Graphics	London, N5	0171 704 9600
Harlequin Solutions	London, W10	0181 960 9400
PCM Technologies Limited	London, E15	0181 519 4497
Portland PMS Ltd	London, EC1R	0171 608 1518
Micro Avika Ltd	London, W1	0171 636 2547
Eureka Computer Systems	Maldenhead	01628 828 244
ComputerCentre Maidstone	Maldstone	01622 675144
GBM Digital Technologies Ltd	Manchester	0161 273 5562
Computer Capability Ltd	Marford, Exeter	01392 207620
Orchard Computing Ltd	Milton Keynes	01908 640313
Oxford Macintosh Solutions	Oxford	01865 882504
Absolute Computers	Oxford	01865 744115
Akita Ltd	Oxford	01869 337088
Bidmuthin Technologies Ltd	Pinner, Middlesex	0181 888 4400
Creative Graphic Systems	Reading	01754 887766
Computer Integration Company Ltd	Redhill	01737 644829
EuroMac	Romford	01708 479898
CS Systems	Sale, Cheshire	0161 976 2199
Stidwell Technology	Southall	01564 775775
The Apple Studio	Stockton on Tees	01642 679000
Adams Computers	Sutton Coldfield	0121 354 9222
Ideas into Print	Swansea	01792 391290
MacExpress	Tavistock	01827 281 600
Twy Typewriting Limited	Telford	01822 619007
Kinesys Ltd	Telford	01952 246 111
AT Computers	Tewkesbury	01684 291112
Quay IT	Tonnes	01803 868 009
The Last Word	Twickenham	0181 831 6965
Twilight Zone Engineering Ltd	Wadford	01923 801812
The Mac Express	West Wickham, Kent	0181 462 5626
QualForm Computer Prod.	Woodford Halse, Northants	01527 263 950
The Saville Group Ltd	York	01904 782782

National Mail Order Outlets
Gordon Harwood Computers	Alfreton, Nr Derby	01773 836781
Dabs Direct	Bolton	0800 680 000
Computer Warehouse Ltd	Brentford	0181 400 1234
MacLine	Carlshaton	0181 401 1111
The Mac Zone	Guildford	0800 393 696
Mac Supplies	London, W3	0181 282 8282
Mygate Limited	London, SE12	0800 018 7539
Camelot	London, NW1	0171 383 2727
Biggans Systems Ltd	Nottingham	0115 916 5599
MacWarehouse	Wadford	0800 181 332

National Retail Partners
Also available at Harrods and John Lewis department stores nationwide.
The above does not constitute a full listing of Apple Resellers.

The Swiss are indignant as the US opens old wounds, reports David Hearst in Bern

Bluster of broken myth

THE deadline is approaching and the conservative Swiss are receding in horror: to be charged with concealing the war record of your fathers is bad enough, but to be hit with a threat by individual Americans to sue to boycott Swiss banks is a different matter.

"Who are the Americans to be judging us? Whose wealth was founded on slavery? In the war they only gave up their neutrality when they were attacked," said Thomas Borer, the career diplomat appointed to head off international pressure. His indignation is partly rhetorical — his wife is American.

Beneath the bluster of a small country which thought it occupied the moral high ground of Europe lies a serious loss of self-image. The truth which has emerged from dormant accounts, the gold trade with the Nazis, and unannounced insurance policies has knocked the stuffing out of the Swiss.

The myth of Sonderfall Schweiz (Switzerland as a special case) — that laity

Efforts to defuse transatlantic row

THE United States and Switzerland sought yesterday to head off potential boycotts of Swiss banks over Holocaust-era claims, saying sanctions would be counter-productive.

As US local government officials met in New York to consider the boycott call, the two governments issued a joint statement seeking to defuse the emotional transatlantic row.

The deadline for banks to settle claims is March 31, but Senator Alfonse D'Amato proposed putting off any decision on boycotts until April 23. — Reuters.

stapo hit them and shot at them. I was so glad that it was noon, and most people were at home having lunch. There was nobody around to tell me that I should not be doing what in fact I was doing."

Vrand Clement, the historian who discovered the officer's report, says the people living in Thurgau could not plead ignorance: everyone knew what was happening.

Ms Clement says the testimony of the police officer made clear that not all in the canton were friendly with the Nazis. "There were many in Thurgau, a high proportion of women, who hid refugees and passed them on inland," she said.

Communities, said: "When you confront elderly people about the war, they either say, 'We knew nothing' or 'It's all true, but we are not the only culprits'."

"I see that as an important development. If the Swiss say that they were no worse than others, they imply that they were no better than others, and the whole picture of Sonderfall Schweiz changes."

Swiss banks and the national government are waking up to their responsibilities. A detailed report about the country's role as the Nazis' bankers will be published next month by an international commission of historians.

Another commission will establish how many unclaimed bank accounts date back to the Nazi era. A fund of 273 million Swiss franc has been set up by banks and business for Holocaust.

Still the Swiss in Bern and Zurich ask: "Why us? All Swiss banks and all Swiss of all generations are being tarred with the same brush."

Mr Bloch smiles: "Now you know, I tell them, what it feels like to be Jewish."

Boris Yeltsin gestures to reporters yesterday. He appeared animated but occasionally confused during the press conference. PHOTOGRAPH: MIKHAIL METZEL

Past and present puzzle Yeltsin

James Meek in Bor

THE idea was enlightened. After European union and a European single currency — a European single history. Why shouldn't tens of millions of French, German and Russian schoolchildren swap their narrow national textbooks for an agreed version of European history?

It wasn't the size of the class that raised doubts but the number of teachers — three of them: Helmut Kohl, Boris Yeltsin and Jacques Chirac, none of them sure whether they were teaching history or making it.

And none of them able to agree what had happened in the previous two hours of their troika summit yesterday, let alone the previous millennium.

They did agree, however, that the three countries' historians should sit down and calmly settle a single

Strike threat as 200,000 face Russian dole queue

THE head of Russia's main trade union movement threatened strike action yesterday and condemned an IMF-sponsored government plan to lay off 200,000 state workers, writes Tom Whithouse in Moscow.

"It is necessary to create new jobs rather than cut them down by hundreds of thousands," said Mikhail Shumakov of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions.

As a condition of a $6.25 billion IMF loan programme, the government has agreed to budget cuts of $4 billion, but details of their implementation did not emerge until yesterday.

The deputy finance minister, Alexei Kudrin, has reportedly said that 200,000 employees, including 66,000 teachers and 22,000 health workers, will lose their jobs.

possibilities before the European Union.

The history book aside, they were able to agree yesterday on a multinational force to fight ecological disasters, and a Franco-Russian-German university (Mr Yeltsin said this would be an actual building, his partners saw it as more of a concept).

Mr Yeltsin looked pale and spoke slowly, with some effort of articulation. It was the first time he had met the foreign media en masse since his recovery from an infection.

At one point he appeared to mistake a photo opportunity for the beginning of the press conference and later had difficulty unscrewing his gift to the French and German leaders.

Each was presented with one of three gold and silver cream jugs, fixed together with a key, which Mr Yeltsin said would be brought together every time they met. The sole key will remain in Moscow.

Chancellor Kohl seemed to have attended a different history course, one in which the EU had been invented and had 13 other members apart from France and Germany, and in which the United States was an ally rather than a rival in a clash of civilisations.

"Our meeting isn't aimed against anyone," he said.

"We're not trying to make anyone anxious or jealous. President Jacques Chirac and I as chancellor of Germany are trying to reflect our res-

Suspect serial killer held

Jon Handley in Paris

FRENCH police yesterday arrested a man they believe is the serial killer and rapist of up to seven young Parisian women in the past year.

A police spokesman said Guy Georges, aged 37, a vagrant of Afro-Caribbean origin, was detained shortly after midnight near the bars and strip clubs of Pigalle in eastern Paris. His arrest came within hours of police releasing his photograph.

The suspect, who has served prison sentences for sex crimes committed in 1982 and 1983, was also held briefly in 1994 in connection with a murder case but was released when his DNA sample failed to match any on the victim.

Since then, police believe, he may have raped and killed three times — prompting particular concern in the student district of Paris's 10th and 11th arrondissements.

The arrest is bound to raise questions about the efficiency of the French police, already under fire in Britain for the length of the investigation into the car crash that killed Diana, Princess of Wales, and the basic errors made during the inquiry into the unsolved murder of the Cornish teenager Caroline Dickinson.

But investigators were confident yesterday that they would get a conviction. They said DNA evidence from the bodies of three women, all assaulted in the same area of eastern Paris between December 1994 and November 1997, tied their deaths to one man.

They also believe there is a "strong probability" that the man — dubbed the Butcher of the Bastille by the French press — may be responsible for the murder of a fourth woman, and a "reasonable chance" that he killed up to three others in crimes dating back to 1991.

A woman identified only as Elisabeth O managed to escape her attacker in June 1995. She helped police assemble a photo-fit portrait, but described the suspect as being North African in appearance.

More than 50 men were questioned — including one in London — but released for lack of a DNA match.

It was only last week that Parisian detectives expanded their trawl of DNA archives beyond men of North African origin. The genetic profile of the suspect allegedly matches traces of saliva found on a cigarette in the flat of one victim.

first direct

why not bank for free?

for 24 hour telephone banking

0800 24 24 24

For full written details of our services write to First Direct, Freepost, Leeds LS98 2ZF. First Direct is a division of Midland Bank plc. First Direct reserves the right to decline to open an account for you. To maintain a quality service, calls may be monitored and/or recorded. Applicants must be 18 or over. Free banking means that there are no charges for cheque and cash machine withdrawals in the UK, standing orders and direct debits, Switch payments or monthly statements.

Member HSBC Group

10 WORLD NEWS

Team enters first Iraqi palace

Julian Borger
Middle East Correspondent

A GROUP of weapons experts and diplomats yesterday entered one of the presidential palaces that Saddam Hussein had vowed never to open to international scrutiny, marking the first substantial achievement of last month's agreement with the United Nations on weapons inspections.

The eight-hour visit to the Radwaniyah Palace in Baghdad was the first by inspectors from the UN Special Commission (Unsc) to any of the tightly guarded palaces in the seven years of their mission in Iraq — a breakthrough for the principle of unfettered access for which the United States and Britain went to the brink of war.

An Iraqi soldier watches weapons inspectors leave the UN headquarters in Baghdad on their way to the Radwaniyah Palace. PHOTOGRAPH: PAVEL KOPCZYNSKI

The first of a round of "baseline" visits, intended to survey the presidential compounds, and establish the principle of free access to any site where Unsc believes biological or chemical weapons may be concealed.

Horst Hothoff, a German diplomat, said the inspection party broke into several teams once inside the compound. Asked if the Iraqi escorts had been co-operative, Mr Hothoff said: "Fantastic, absolutely positive... I am personally really impressed by the spirit of the co-operation."

An Unsc official said the Iraqi government had been told on Wednesday evening that a palace visit would take place, but were not told which palace.

Before last month's accord Baghdad drew a "red line" around the presidential sites, refusing Unsc entry. In response, the US and Britain assembled an armada in the Gulf and threatened air strikes.

The US has treated the February agreement with scepticism. Yesterday its ambassador to the UN, Bill Richardson, said: "So far the inspections of presidential sites, of sensitive sites, have gone well. But the real test will be compliance over an extended period of time, not on brief, snap inspections."

He also reiterated Washington's tough position on the sanctions imposed on Iraq after its 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Blair shows support for Palestine

Ian Black
Diplomatic Editor

TONY Blair is to make an unprecedented gesture of British support for an independent Palestinian state by staying overnight in Gaza next month to match an overnight stay in Israel.

After Robin Cook's controversial visit to Jerusalem last week, the prime minister's stay at an official guesthouse after dinner with Yasser Arafat will be seen as symbolic.

Mr Blair will be the first national leader to spend the night on the territory of the Palestinian National Authority and thus send a strong signal about its future status, despite the impasse in peace negotiations with Israel.

"For us this will be a double visit that underlines the fact that the former British mandated territory of Palestine now has two political entities," Arafat said, the Palestinian ambassador to Britain, told the Guardian yesterday. "One is not yet a state but it is a state in the making. We highly appreciate the symbolic and political significance of this visit."

Britain ruled Palestine from 1917 to 1948, when it was handed over to the United Nations as Arab-Jewish fighting began. Palestinians have long blamed it for supporting Zionism, by promising a national home for the Jews.

include Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, a huge market for British defence exports.

With Britain anxious not to offend Israel after the continuing ructions over the Foreign Secretary's trip, every detail of the Israeli Palestinian leg is being meticulously planned. "Obviously we are very aware we have to do the right thing in both quarters," a Whitehall official said.

Mr Blair, representing the European Union as well as Britain, is due to arrive in Israel on April 19, just over a week before it begins its 50th anniversary celebrations. He is expected to visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, a stop for all visiting foreign leaders.

Mr Cook was criticised for failing to do this but laying a wreath on a memorial to Palestinians killed in the 1948 war. The Foreign Office insisted this was not pre-planned but he could not refuse.

Mr Blair could also face controversy over his wish to visit holy places in East Jerusalem if, as expected, Israel insists on providing security.

Because Britain does not recognise its sovereignty over the unilaterally united city.

Jacques Chirac, the French president, had a spat with an Israeli policeman when he visited East Jerusalem two years ago.

News in brief

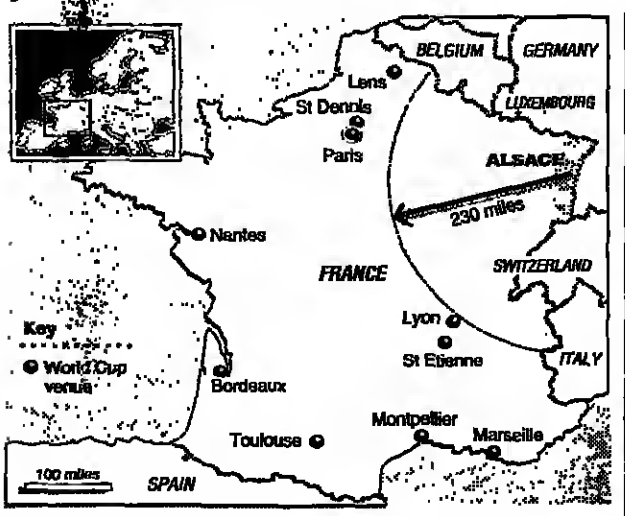

24 girls killed as blaze razes boarding school dormitory outside Mombasa

TWENTY-FOUR girls died in a fire that roared through a boarding school dormitory near Kenya's main coastal city, Mombasa, police said yesterday.

The girls who perished in the flames were burned beyond recognition. Superintendent Peter Kimani said: "Three girls are in intensive care in the general ward and 23 others were treated and discharged," the officer said.

One hundred and forty-four girls board at Bombolulu Girls Secondary School, which is 12 miles north-west of Mombasa and close to the highway that leads to the capital, Nairobi.

It was not immediately known how many girls were in the dormitory, which was razed by the flames. — Reuters, Nairobi

Alsace offers French sanctuary to tourists fleeing Cup fever

FANCY a summer holiday in France, but not the prospect of sharing it with 2.5 million football fans? Try Alsace, which yesterday kicked off a publicity campaign touting the virtues as a World Cup-free zone, writes Jon Henley in Paris.

Alsace, in on the German border the far east, is one of the few areas of France not to host any of this summer's 64 World Cup games, which start on June 10. Alsace is making a virtue of the fact that it is 230 miles from the nearest venue.

The new tourist brochure features bina skies, blue lakes, and a distinct absence of footballers sporting France's bright blue strip. "Alsace: for a football-free holiday," it promises.

"There are no World Cup matches in Alsace, and we're proud of it," said the board's director, Olivier de Richauff.

Not that Mr de Richauff is actively discouraging those who like football in moderation. "You can have a lovely day out in Alsace, and still watch the matches just as well as anywhere else — on television," he said.

Quake rocks central Italy

An earthquake measuring 6.4 on the Richter scale shook central Italy yesterday but no serious damage was reported. Quakes in the area last September killed 10 and badly damaged the Basilica of St Francis at Assisi. — AP.

Rebels kidnap 27

Leftwing Colombian rebels have kidnapped 27 people, including four Americans and an Italian, at a roadblock south of Bogotá, a government official said yesterday. — AP.

Rwandan killings

Suspected Hutu rebels killed five high school pupils and wounded eight others in Nkuli in north-west Rwanda, authorities said yesterday. The Tutsi-led army has been battling stepped-up rebel attacks in the area. — AP.

Tamil Tigers hit

Sri Lankan jets destroyed the Tamil Tigers' forward base at Vattachchi village, east of Parathan town yesterday, the defence ministry claimed, adding that jets also destroyed 20 rebel boats moored in north-eastern Mullattivu district. — Reuters.

Banana appeal fails

Zimbabwe's supreme court ruled yesterday that former president Canaan Banana must stand trial on sodomy charges, rejecting his appeal that pre-trial publicity had prejudiced his right to a fair hearing. — Reuters.

Press 'harassed'

The Inter American Press Association has asked Guatemala's President Alvaro Arzu to use his authority to stop an alleged government campaign to drive advertisers away from investigative news magazine Cronica. — Reuters.

PDS man dropped

Germany's Party of Democratic Socialism yesterday dropped its celebrity candidate for a key east Berlin district. Elmar Schmeling, a former West German intelligence chief, was being replaced because of a financial scandal, said the former East German Communists. — Reuters.

Cartoon turn-off

Turkey's state-run television watchdog has banned the Show TV channel from broadcasting for one day because an episode of US-made cartoon Goosebumps was "too violent". "There were elements which create fear and provoke aggression," said a spokesman. — Reuters.

US to help African renaissance

David Beresford
In Cape Town

PRESIDENT Bill Clinton committed the United States yesterday to a partnership with South Africa in pursuit of the dream of an African renaissance.

He told a joint sitting of parliament in Cape Town that the US needed, and was determined to build, a strong South Africa.

The first US head of state to visit Africa, Mr Clinton was given an ecstatic reception by parliamentarians as he entered what he described as "this hall of freedom" hand-in-hand with Nelson Mandela. Hillary Clinton, sitting in the public gallery with President Mandela's unofficial "first lady", Grace Machel, watched as her husband told parliament: "In overcoming your past you offer a powerful example to people who are torn by their own divisions in all parts of this earth."

Mr Clinton added: "Two centuries ago the courage and imagination that created the United States and the principles that are enshrined in our constitution inspired men and women without a voice across the world to believe that one day they, too, could have a government of the people by the people and for the people."

"Now the courage and imagination that created the new South Africa and the principles that guide your constitution inspire all of us to be animated by the belief that one day humanity all the world over can at last be released from the bonds of hatred and bigotry."

Illegal immigrants leave Seminyth camp in Malaysia for forcible repatriation to Indonesia and economic turmoil. PHOTOGRAPH: UPALI ATURUGURI

Four die in Malaysia as illegal immigrants riot

Nick Cumming-Bruce
in Bangkok

RIOTS at a Malaysian detention camp for illegal immigrants left three Indonesians and a policeman dead yesterday, exposing the problems facing Kuala Lumpur as tens of thousands of workers flee economic turmoil in Indonesia to search for work.

The deaths occurred at Seminyth camp, 25 miles from the capital, one of four into which police moved before taken yesterday to extract hundreds of inmates for forcible repatriation. Eyewitnesses said fires broke out and shooting erupted, lasting several minutes.

A police spokesman said 38 people were also injured. A local human rights organisation, Suaram, said at least five people were killed.

Police used water cannon and tear gas at another camp on the west coast against inmates who set fire to their barracks. At a camp in the south-west, around 140 inmates escaped during a deportation operation. But several hundred inmates were taken from camps to the port of Lumut and loaded on to a waiting Indonesian naval vessel.

The deportations were particularly sensitive as inmates from the troubled Aceh area of Indonesia's northern island of Sumatra were taken. The area is the subject of a ferociously suppressed movement for regional autonomy.

Human rights groups fear that some of the Acehese inmates may be genuine refugees who could face torture or worse if sent back. A spokesman for the Aceh-Sumatra National Liberation Front in Sweden, who claimed that 24 inmates were killed in yesterday's rioting, said the Indonesians had no choice but to resist, because "once they reach Indonesia it will be death for them". But the Acehese are only a small part of a broader and quickly escalating problem posed for Malaysia and Singapore by tens of thousands of illegal immigrants from all parts of Indonesia as the world's fourth most populous country slides deeper into economic recession and human misery.

The number of out of work in Indonesia has doubled to 8.7 million — roughly 10 per cent of the workforce — in eight months, a manpower ministry spokesman was quoted as saying yesterday. Such bald statistics do little to reveal the hardship in a country where even in years of prosperity millions eked out a living doing odd jobs or part-time work, and where rocketing prices have put even milk beyond the reach of the poor.

The latest repatriation drive coincides with an effort by Malaysia to cut the number of foreign migrant labourers in the country. This group reportedly numbers about 3 million, of which half are Indonesians, in a workforce of about 8 million.

DIRECT LINE

CUSTOMERS COULD

SAVE 20%

BY SWITCHING TO

A BROKER.

A recent survey of ex-Direct Line car insurance customers, now insured through a broker or independent intermediary, showed that on average they saved over 20% of the Direct Line price. Find a broker or intermediary today, to reduce your premiums.

NIG Skandia

YOU'RE BETTER OFF WITH A BROKER

Analysis Film censorship

They know what's good for you

As Lolita is passed for release Steve Busfield and Dan Glatzier see how the Daily Mail wages war on Britain's censors

ONCE again the British "censor" has felt the full wrath of Middle England. The British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) has been upstaged by the Daily Mail in its campaign against the release of Lolita, a film which the Daily Mail does not like.

The BBFC has been upstaged by the Daily Mail in its campaign against the release of Lolita, a film which the Daily Mail does not like. The BBFC has been upstaged by the Daily Mail in its campaign against the release of Lolita, a film which the Daily Mail does not like.

Christopher Tooke, the BBFC's film critic, is used to justify the paper's pro-censorship position. Tooke's review of Lolita concluded: "Freedom of artistic expression is a great good, but not the only good — or the only freedom. None of the great defenders of free speech in the past 300 years would ever have imagined that in the late 20th century their arguments would be used to enable the spread of paedophilia and child pornography."

Almost two years ago, Tooke wrote that David Cronenberg's movie Crash should be banned "on account of immorality". The controversial film version of JG Ballard's disturbing novel about sexual relationships between car crash victims may have lost much of the author's ponderings about the strange dividing line between what is perceived as sexy (very fast cars) and what is not (road accidents). Yet Crash did provoke a challenging public debate.

The Evening Standard's critic, Alexander Walker, said it contained "some of the most perverted acts of sexual deviance I have ever seen in mainstream cinema". The Daily Telegraph crucially ran a series of articles considering both sides of the argument, including pieces by both the paper's film critic (hostile) and JG Ballard (favourable).

The Daily Mail, however, prefers not to let ambiguity cloud its coverage. While other newspapers questioned the morality of the movie, Tooke berated the filmmakers. When more than 50 British filmmakers wrote to the BBFC pleading for Crash to be given a cinema certificate, the Daily Mail immediately demanded to know which of these signatories had seen the film. What right had they to oppose a ban when they had not seen it?

When the BBFC approved the cinematic release, the Daily Mail's focus switched to the board itself. "The move will... dramatically increase pressure for the board to be replaced with a tougher and more accountable body..."

An unnamed BBFC member was quoted as saying: "The film has been distorted by what has been said about it. People need to make up their own minds." But then David Alton countered: "I can see little point in maintaining the BBFC if it is going to allow a film like Crash into our cinemas. It effectively forfeits its right to carry on."

Then the members of the board came under fire. Twice Christopher Tooke wrote about the board's director, James Ferman. The headlines were: "Does anything appeal this man?" and "Time to sack this feeble censor".

Next it was Ferman's fellow board members: "Exposed: Secret censors who refused to put a ban on Crash... You are not entitled to know anything about the 14 censors at the BBFC... Ferman insists they are 'ordinary people whose views accurately reflect the moral climate and judgment of the nation'. Our inquiries show they are drawn largely from a narrow range of public-sector jobs — social work, teaching, the probation service, the media. Are they

Censored

The BBFC does not generally publish detailed information of cuts made to films and videos. But through a combination of BBFC statements and unofficial sources, including journalists and campaigners, we can gain a fairly clear idea of specific cuts demanded. These are among films which have caused public debate:

Lolita: Passed for screening this week, with an 18 certificate. The Daily Mail has publicised claims "that it could encourage child sex abuse". Sex scenes avoid breaking the law by using a 19-year-old body double for the 15-year-old actress Dominique Swain. The BBFC consulted two psychiatrists who did not believe that it could exacerbate paedophile behaviour.

qualified to sit in judgment on what you and your children watch?" Westminster Council did indeed ban Crash from its cinema screens. This denied the film a West End outlet. Yet it received far more publicity than mere marketing could ever have achieved, and hundreds of other cinemas around the country (and in central London, but outside Westminster's control) went ahead with their screenings.

The BBFC remains, albeit with Andreas Whitman Smith as its new president. But he was not the only person approached or indeed interviewed for the job of BBFC president to replace the entrenched Lord Harewood. One candidate, sounded out by the Home Office, which curiously has responsibility for the BBFC, describes the sinister experience of being interviewed for the post in 1996:

"I went in to be faced by a panel of six people. I didn't know who they were. They all looked like freemasons and made it more than clear during the course of what was an extremely hostile interview that they did not want to be talking to me. The whole place is a total mess. In the end it didn't matter. I didn't hear anything for four months, not a word, not even an acknowledgement that the interview had taken place."

It is perhaps comforting to the film-makers and distributors to know that the internal affairs of the BBFC are run in the same Byzantine, opaque fashion as its external activities. A unilateral — and unexplained — move late last year by James Ferman to relax the rules governing hard-core pornography met with dissent. Customs and Excise, uninformed of the relaxation, threatened to raid the BBFC, and Home Secretary Jack Straw publicly attacked the censor.

But Ferman, like Whitman Smith if not Straw, recognises that the BBFC is plodding along a rather pointless route. Walk 100 yards from the BBFC's Soho Square offices and the absurdity of its R18 classification for soft-core pornography available in licensed sex shops becomes Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom: The 1984 Spielberg film was cut for cinema and video to gain a PG certificate. These included: - Cuts to a close-up of a heart being ripped from a chest; - The loss of the Chinese kid burning a guard's stomach with a flaming torch.

Terminator 2: Judgement Day: Cut by 17 seconds last year for video, to gain a 15 certificate. (An 18 version was also issued.) Cuts include: - Schwarzenegger's attack on the bikers loses the shot of a biker falling on to a stove; - 3.3 seconds are cut from the shooting of a SWAT team.

Shawshank: Cut for cinema with a further 9 seconds cut for video. The BBFC was concerned with "its prudent emphasis on exploitative nudity". A rape scene was cut for cinema, and further for video, "since the price of the rape could be adequately conveyed by the sight of the battered and bleeding victim".

Pulp Fiction: The video of the 1995 Tarantino film had 3 seconds reframed to gain an 18 certificate, to remove a close-up of heroin injection. The BBFC saw this as condoning heroin abuse.

apparent. XXX films, the uncensored, hard-core pornography refused a licence by the BBFC, is openly on sale at less salubrious establishments.

"The black market is stronger than it ever was," says the BBFC's 1996-97 annual report, "since market forces are driving customers away from the licensed shops... but the task of reassessing the limits of legality in licensed sex shops was to provide a major challenge over the next year."

the sort of talk that could bring out the beast in the Daily Mail. For the immediate future brings new challenges that could undermine not only the BBFC but also expose the censorship system as archaic and authoritarian. Film industry analysts estimate that within three to five years the major Hollywood studios will have made the technology sufficiently affordable and available to enable viewers to download films via the Internet on to their television screens. And with the

How a film is classified

The British Board of Film Classification is an independent, non-governmental body, set up by the film industry, which has assumed full responsibility for film censorship since 1912 and video since 1985. Statutory powers remain with local councils, who may overrule the BBFC's decisions. So the power is one of persuasion.

1 The first viewing

The BBFC reaches decisions by consensus. Each film is seen by two examiners, who view a mix of film and video for 5 hours a day, 31 days a week. They must agree on cuts. Specialist staff view films and videos in foreign languages. Examiners log details including: - Plot, character, outline of individual scenes - Times of all significant details - Details of scenes that affect classification, eg camera angles - Bad language. The examiners generally agree on the appropriate category.

2 If they disagree...

If the examiners disagree, the film is sent by another route, usually by the presence of a physical officer — who has been put to the test by the examiners — to the president of the board. The president may then refer the matter to the full board.

3 Cuts

The BBFC's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

wanting more sex... Two letters thought it was "morally wrong" to question the existence of Santa Claus in two different films. Christopher Tooke, one imagines, is a firm believer in Santa Claus.

Sources: British Board of Film Classification (1996/97 Annual Report). Detailed news of film censorship is found on a number of unofficial Websites. Among them: www.dailymail.co.uk (UK censorship news and details of cuts, run by Dave Taylor); www.cia.napier.ac.uk/miley/bbfc/ (detail about the BBFC's working process, run by Mike Jackson).

Graphical Finbar Sheehy: Researcher Matt Keating. Steve Busfield is the Guardian's deputy financial news editor until 1997 he was showbusiness reporter at the Daily Mail. Dan Glatzier is the Guardian's arts correspondent.

Tomorrow: JG Ballard and Anne Atkin of the Daily Telegraph debate film censorship in The Week.

Decca Aitkenhead: How to behave like a pig 12

4 The film examines

All cuts are discussed and justified by a weekly meeting. When the film is ready to be viewed by a second examiner, they have been seen by the first. The board's set of all film cuts in its history.

5 Rejects

If a film or video is thought to break the law, eg by being obscene, so that the board has no amount of cuts will make it acceptable, then it will be refused a certificate. Film companies may then submit the work to a local authority in the hope of a licence.

What the board looks for

The board's responsibilities include violence, swearing, sex, sexual or violent behaviour, drugs, alcohol, smoking, language, and public order.

Violence: When films are violent, many parents feel that their children should not see them. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Swearing: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Sex: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Sexual or violent behaviour: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Drugs: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Alcohol: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Language: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Public order: The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions. The board's decisions are based on the film's content, not on the filmmaker's intentions.

Do you have difficulty obtaining your copy of

The Guardian INTERNATIONAL

00 44 171 713 4131

Email: john.adams@guardian.co.uk

or write to: John Adams, 119 Farringdon Road London EC1R 3ER

Comment

Diary

Matthew Norman

All too rarely, it is this Diary's privilege to bring to wider public attention a rare talent in local government, and today we salute Derek Boxall, Mr Boxall, a councillor in Somerset in Somerset, has put his mind to the problem of dog dirt on the streets, and come up with a solution of such brilliance that I am tempted to weep. Councillor Boxall wishes to use DNA testing to match dog with faeces. After being told by a Taunton hospital that each test costs £100, but that (as a hospital) they do not handle dog waste, he was far from disheartened. "I've contacted a lab in Bristol and a forensic lab in Cheltenham," says the councillor, "who say it'll cost £300." Almost there then. All Mr Boxall has to do now is take a hair from every dog in the area, store every one's DNA on computer, pick the turds off the streets and wait for them to match up. It seems almost too simple, but then so many of the greatest ideas are.

Yet another intriguing fact comes to light about Andrew Smith, the once obscure employment figure who now enjoys a growing cult following. In 1982, Red Smith was chairman of the anti-Falklands-war campaign in Oxford. Please keep them coming.

THE comedian Mark Thomas continues a relentless persecution of his social superiors. Two years ago, for his Channel 4 show, Mark hounded Sir Evelyn de Rothschild into abandoning his 40 per cent tax deferment on an antiques collection. The deferment was conditional, under inheritance tax legislation, on it being made available for public viewing, and after Mark invited hordes of lapping philistines to see it, Sir Evelyn conked up to keep it private. In a more recent series, the same fate befell Fatty "Nicholas" Soames and his three-tiered mahogany buffet. Now Mark is to reduce Fatty's brother Rupert to an Arthur Daily figure. Poor Rupert has been pressurised into offering the public a glimpse of his French Empire Chair... not at his home, of course (you don't want them filching up the carpets), but in the car park of the Five Arrows Hotel in Waddesdon. Anytime after 5pm, or tomorrow (9.30-11.30am). Reports are welcomed.

BY way of a dangerous lure to the unknown, the Sunline Boys of the Spectator jointly consider the Guardian and Jonathan Aitken. While sane and rational Paul Johnson seeks solace in understatement, Taki George is on a sublime polemical form (at least, I think he is; I still cannot read fluently, alas, in pidgin English). At one point, Taki even mischievously turns on Paul, drawing attention to a hostile article about him in the New York Times, and to this we may return shortly. Most impressive, however, is the Cypriot's assault on this paper for its "mushy notions about criminals, drugs, promiscuity, you name it, they worship it". How very true... and by whom could the attack be more effectively made than a self-proclaimed playboy with a conviction for smuggling cocaine?

WHILE driving past the Conservative Party headquarters in Tatton, a colleague notes a curiosity. The brass plaque outside has two pieces of masking tape on it. This is clearly the act of a local vandal, and well-meaning readers in the area would probably wish to remove the tape at once.

GET JERRY TO OFFER MEN TO LEAVE THE CONTEST

It's OK to behave like a pig - just blame it on the News of the Screws

Decca Aitkenhead

FOR New York women thinking of getting married, there is a service some care to take advantage of. A suspicious fiancée can hire an agency to test her intended's fidelity. The agency sends a smouldering bombshell of a siren his way one night to do her B-movie best to seduce him; if he resists, his fiancée is reassured. If he succumbs, the engagement is over.

There are all sorts of reasons why one might think this a dubious course of action. It suggests, for one, an alarming lack of trust from the outset. More to the point, only a very foolish soul would rejoice in evidence of one act of self-restraint as a life-time guarantee of monogamy. But these tend not to be the terms of most people's misgivings. Ask around, and you find a great weight of opinion which says the idea is flawed because the poor man had been "set up". His indiscretion is cancelled out. He isn't to blame for giving in to temptation - his fiancée's to blame for putting it in his way.

It was presumably this body of opinion Sir John Hall had in mind when he faced the cameras on Tuesday to announce his return to the chair of Newcastle United's board of directors. It had been a bad week or so for Sir John, what with seeing his shares in trouble and his son exposed as a repulsive little runt. One can only guess at which reputation mattered more - the family's or that of the business - but either way, an urgent dose of PR was required. So Sir John launched not an apology but a sour attack on the press.

How could they have visited such devastation on his family? How was he to explain it to a sobbing grandchild? What had they done to deserve this? Indignation at the awful injustice of it all flowed forth. It wouldn't be enough to save his son and his friend - but it wasn't a total waste of time either. Sir John was only relishing a curious ethical exemption clause he's seen others use to such impressive effect of late.

When Bill Clinton's fight-back began against Monica Lewinsky, one of the words coming out of the White House was "set-up". In no time, families in hometown America began complaining about the unwelcome task of explaining oral sex and infidelity to little Tommy while the late-time news was on. What did the media think it was doing, bringing this filth into their homes? They hadn't asked for it, for heaven's sake. The White House kept hitting that button, and within days, even in the minds of those who suspected Clinton was guilty, the Lewinsky scandal had become the fault of the press, not the president.

Mirror reporter Dawn Alford found out how opinion can turn, when in just a few days over Christmas she was transformed from a investigative journalist into a convicted felon. She had been a bad week or so for Sir John, what with seeing his shares in trouble and his son exposed as a repulsive little runt. One can only guess at which reputation mattered more - the family's or that of the business - but either way, an urgent dose of PR was required. So Sir John launched not an apology but a sour attack on the press.

How could they have visited such devastation on his family? How was he to explain it to a sobbing grandchild? What had they done to deserve this? Indignation at the awful injustice of it all flowed forth. It wouldn't be enough to save his son and his friend - but it wasn't a total waste of time either. Sir John was only relishing a curious ethical exemption clause he's seen others use to such impressive effect of late.

When Bill Clinton's fight-back began against Monica Lewinsky, one of the words coming out of the White House was "set-up". In no time, families in hometown America began complaining about the unwelcome task of explaining oral sex and infidelity to little Tommy while the late-time news was on. What did the media think it was doing, bringing this filth into their homes? They hadn't asked for it, for heaven's sake. The White House kept hitting that button, and within days, even in the minds of those who suspected Clinton was guilty, the Lewinsky scandal had become the fault of the press, not the president.

Mirror reporter Dawn Alford found out how opinion can turn, when in just a few days over Christmas she was transformed from a investigative journalist into a convicted felon. She had been a bad week or so for Sir John, what with seeing his shares in trouble and his son exposed as a repulsive little runt. One can only guess at which reputation mattered more - the family's or that of the business - but either way, an urgent dose of PR was required. So Sir John launched not an apology but a sour attack on the press.

Lord Rees-Mogg. Vindication was some years away. The Sunday Times exposed the same sort of thing that year for approaching a selection of Tory MPs, offering them cash for questions in the House, and publishing the names of the ones who said thank you very much. "He may have been a bit naive in not checking out the man who approached him and gave him the cheque," was as far as an aide of one guilty MP would go. "I don't think he is a dishonest man." The parliamentary privileges committee declared that the paper's conduct "fell substantially below the standards to be expected of legitimate investigative journalism".

Each of these stories had a legal angle; each had a different set of arguments about means and ends. You might well feel a teenager selling a tanner drawer didn't justify the use of the word "undercover" in the headline. But Sir John Hall felt his son's treatment to be unfair because he wasn't an "MP or an arms trader" - and you can see the point he was making. But the subtext of his indignation was grounded in something else - the belief that what was said and done in Marble Hall actually counted, because it only came out through deception.

"ENTRAPMENT" in the strict legal sense is a sacred word of general opinion, however, it is practically meaningless. You could get me hilled drunk and I'd come out with all sorts of embarrassing rubbish. I'd be modified if it was printed in a newspaper. But you couldn't entrap me to say black people stank or that poofs were perverts - nor, no matter who I thought you were, to sleep with prostitutes, slag off my friends, cheat on my boyfriend, or insult Guardian readers so appallingly that, were a transcript of the conversation printed instead of this column, I'd be forced to resign.

Where did this idea that entrapment abides ugly behaviour come from? Probably not from some muddled misunderstanding of the legal meaning of the term. Instead, it seems more like a product of our anxiety to seem media savvy. We are so laden down with knowledge of the all-powerful media that it is incumbent on anyone who wants to seem like a sensible grown-up to dismiss everything as a media get-up.

There is much irony in this. As the public world becomes a more slick, stage-managed place, the proper response is surely to mistrust the official image of everyone. Good old-fashioned stings should be celebrated. Instead, we have gone from congratulating ourselves on knowing that you can't trust everything you read in the tabloids, to becoming in danger of feeling that no misconduct exposed by an undercover operation should be fully held to account, even if it's manifestly true.

The two directors of Newcastle United did, happily, get held to account. Newcastle's fans had the wit not to be too bothered about the process by which the story was uncovered, and proved themselves considerably more media savvy than many Americans during the Lewinsky scandal. The next time a public figure is exposed by the press, let's hope the most post-modern sophisticates among us should remember their example.

UK presidency. Labour insiders from Gordon Brown to Peter Mandelson have found themselves explaining why the Government ducked the decision last autumn to call an early referendum on British membership of the euro.

They agree that, after Tony Blair came back from his summer holidays, the decision - which Brown called "probably the most important this country is likely to face in our generation" - was finely balanced. The Asian financial crisis gave the Government the perfect excuse to say that the global economic environment had dramatically changed since they won the election. Even Robin Cook saw that point.

Letters of betrayal

Bill Buford

THE literary news in New York has been of acquisitions. The most noteworthy, of course, is the acquisition of Random House by Bertelsmann. The Pierpont Morgan library has just been given a gift of rare "American literary properties" collected by Carter Burden, a New York businessman with an interest in the media who was a man of letters and book collector and, by the time of his death last year, had collected more than 30,000 such American properties, estimated to be worth many millions. Among the collection are a number of curiosities: the journal Tennessee Williams kept while writing Cat on a Hot Tin Roof and the early poems of William Faulkner. But the prize of the collection is a package of 120 letters that Thomas Pynchon wrote to his literary agent, Candida Donadio. Pynchon is the famously reclusive author of V, Gravity's Rainbow, and Mason & Dixon. It's possible that we know less about him, our contemporary, than, say, Shakespeare. And now, suddenly, these letters.

They begin in 1963 and are postmarked London, Mexico, California, Texas. They are often about the business of writing, and reveal an author who, like most authors, has violent mood swings of confidence and self-doubt. At one point, after the publication of V, Mr Pynchon says that he is writing four different novels at once and "if they can come out on paper anything like what they are inside my head then it will be the literary event of the millennium". A little later, he wonders why he should be writing at all.

THERE are obsessions: his privacy, predictably; the movies; the man is a film out. And a voracious reader, who is interested in the work of his peers and (an exceptional thing for an American writer) not threatened by it. Somehow, even when he was in Mexico, he was getting new novels before they were published, which he read quickly with a greedy appetite.

Pynchon is astonished by a book by John Cheever, the chronicler of the New England suburbs, as he is by a new book by Gore Vidal. And - this was a surprise for me - Pynchon is a tremendous fan of John Le Carré and, for all his privacy and his reluctance to promote his own work, Pynchon is always generous in what he is prepared to do for other writers, especially younger ones. The letters are full of his endorsements, his "burbs", his lines of encouragement. They end abruptly on January 5, 1982, when Ms Donadio received the following: "As of this date, you are no longer authorised to represent me or my work. Cordially, Thomas Pynchon." Candida Donadio is curiously taciturn about the matter. "He was so terribly private," she says, "the statement, made last week, is surprising, given that she was prepared to sell a 'terribly private' correspondence to Carter Burden for $45,000. What drove Ms Donadio to break a professional commitment to confidentiality that, paradoxically, she seems to believe she is still upholding to this day, even though she had already egregiously broken it? When Mr Pynchon abandoned the services of his agent, he took up those offered by her assistant. Publishing can be a painfully intimate business; it mixes contracts and deals with the most personal matters of the soul. The heart gets involved."

My suspicion is that Ms Donadio felt betrayed on a level that was so highly charged with strong feeling that she didn't understand it herself, and the fact that the betrayal involved an assistant who would go on to become Mr Pynchon's new business partner (and was also to become his lover) reinforced the act of disloyalty. Still, it was an extraordinary thing for an agent to do - analogous to a celebrity divorce lawyer handing over his most confidential notes. It's just not done.

What if I stand on the far side of the room, without my glasses? No?

Most of this information about Mr Pynchon's letters I got from a lower conversation with a New York Times reporter named Mel Gussow. Mr Gussow is the only person - outside of the library - who has read the correspondence. He wrote an article, from which Mr Pynchon learned, for the first time, that his correspondence had been sold, and he despatched his lawyer, Jeremy Nussbaum, to see if he could get the letters back.

The letters would not be returned: they are no longer Mr Pynchon's property. But the library agreed that they would be put away until Mr Pynchon had died. Ah, Pynchon, I said, when I went to read them. So I'm too late? What about a little peek?

The librarians shook their heads. Even if I take off my glasses? No, no, they chuckled. What if I stand on the far side of the room, without my glasses, and you hold them in front of the mirror?

No, the personal correspondence of Thomas Pynchon has now disappeared. And maybe that is as it should be.

Watch out, Europe, Murdoch knows the price of everything

Rupert fingers the till

Martin Walker

in Brussels

THE coincidence was stunning. Just as 11 European nations, including Italy, were getting the economic seal of approval to join the new single currency this week, the dark prince among Euro-sceptics was caught fingering the euro till. British attention has so far focused on Tony Blair's phone conversation with his Italian counterpart, Romano Prodi. So it should, given the way in which Labour is following the tawdry Clinton model in raising campaign funds from Bernie Ecclestone and wadding up to fat cats like Rupert.

But in Europe the question is whether, with an eye on Silvio Berlusconi's controlling share in Italy's three big privately-owned TV networks, Rupert is going through a euro conversion. Until now, Rupert Murdoch has been a British Imperialist kind of operator, a Cecil Rhodes of the media and broadcast who has put his chips on the Anglo-Saxon markets of Britain, Australia and the US, with a side bet on China via Hong Kong.

A plunge into Italian TV - however cheap at £4 billion it might look at the current sterling-like exchange rate - would be something altogether new. It would mean not only a different culture for the Murdoch empire, but a different currency, and one poised to become the euro from January 1.

The truth is that the euro and the market it symbolises is now getting too big for any self-respecting global tycoon to ignore. Even without Britain and Sweden and Greece and Denmark, the new euro block will account for 20 per cent of the planet's economic output, the same share as the giant US economy. It will account for an even greater share of world trade than the US, and well over twice as much as Japan.

The sheer scale of the euro project, and the perception that in the long run Britain may have no choice but to join, has always loomed over the arguments in the British cabinet. It now looms again, in the tantalising light of Murdoch's new euro-dalliances. In the course of their various visits to Europe for the

UK presidency, Labour insiders from Gordon Brown to Peter Mandelson have found themselves explaining why the Government ducked the decision last autumn to call an early referendum on British membership of the euro.

They agree that, after Tony Blair came back from his summer holidays, the decision - which Brown called "probably the most important this country is likely to face in our generation" - was finely balanced. The Asian financial crisis gave the Government the perfect excuse to say that the global economic environment had dramatically changed since they won the election. Even Robin Cook saw that point.

There were two reasons why the case for the euro was lost. The first was that Gordon Brown did not have the Treasury behind him. The Treasury paper, UK Membership Of The Single Currency An Assessment Of The Five Economic Tests, concluded that "the UK's economic cycle is not convergent with our European partners, and this divergence could continue for some time". That weakened Brown's hand. But then came the second factor, which weighed heavily with the media-conscious Government.

In Britain's last referendum on Europe in 1975, when a 2:1 margin against staying in at the start of the year was transformed to 2:1 in favour of referendum day, the British media were overwhelmingly in favour. That would not be the case this time. Not just the Telegraph group, but the entire Murdoch empire from Times to Sunday Times, from the Sun to the News of the World and Sky and BS2, would be battling in the last ditch to save the Queen's head on the venerable pound. "We knew it would have been like Dunkirk," confided one Labour source.

It was a rule of thumb for Labour that Rupert was implacably opposed to the euro. They knew of Murdoch's lunch with John Major at Chequers, which has since been made public by Major's press chief Sheila Gunn.

Her version: "It was made quite clear by Murdoch and Sun editor Stuart Higgins that one prime issue on whether or not to support the Tory party was that of the single currency. The Sun would not support Major unless he ruled it out."

So the prospect of a referendum campaign with the Murdoch press and TV even backing the euro, changes everything. If Blair can do euro-deals with Murdoch, so can Europe - if the price is right.

The Guardian

Friday March 27 1998
Edition Number 47133
119 Farringdon Road, London EC1R 3ER
Fax No. 0171-837 4530
E-mail: letters@guardian.co.uk
Website: http://www.guardian.co.uk

Beveridge lives on

But the poor need more

WILL it be a welfare state fit for the millennium? Has the unthinkable been thought? Long before the green paper was finally published yesterday, Labour was claiming to be radically redesigning Beveridge's 50-year-old scheme. The message was clear: the old collectivism generated by the second world war's bombs, black-outs and blitz had run its course. The need now was for a more individualistic approach: "compassion with a hard edge". The Prime Minister spoke of shifting some responsibilities from public to private shoulders, signalled a desire to see social security move from a universal scheme to a safety net system, and expressed a hope that social security bills would be reduced so that there could be more money for health and education.

So is it bye-bye Beveridge? Yes and no. There was no change to the main architecture in yesterday's document. National insurance contributions remain but will be simplified and reformed. Indeed, the link between work and benefits is reinforced, which will disappoint campaigners who have called for women carers — who have no earnings entitlements but a legitimate claim on benefits — to be included within the present scheme. There is no talk of affluence testing — withdrawing benefits from the better-off — and no talk, yet, of compulsory insurance contributions for long-term nursing care (under royal commission scrutiny), or extending compulsory second pension contributions (under scrutiny by a separate pension review), or even introducing a guaranteed minimum pension, as proposed by Labour's national commission on social justice, to cut means testing (still under review).

As set out yesterday, the universal system remains in place. The presentation, thankfully, has changed. Reform is no longer put forward as a cost-cutting exercise. Duties will be reciprocal work for those who can, security for those who cannot. The woefully inadequate level of current benefits is not addressed but the severely disabled — on top of children under 11 helped by last week's budget — are promised an above-inflation increase to benefits. Future disabled claimants, although not those already in receipt of incapacity benefit, are warned that fundamental reforms are coming: there will be a tougher test, fewer will get it, but some savings will be transferred to the severely disabled. Similarly the Disability Living Allowance will not be taxed, nor means-tested, nor given to local councils, but will have a stricter eligibility test.

The big question for some anti-poverty campaigners is partly answered: is Labour transforming social security into an American-style safety-net catering purely for the poor, or will it maintain a continental model in which social security has wider purposes involving security and solidarity? Whitehall on Wednesday was talking of "high-grade safety nets". Is this Labour's "third way"? Not necessarily. In areas where benefits are meeting extra needs — children, disability, retirement — the Government is endorsing the universalists' arguments. The green paper specifically promises a universalist approach to disabled people. The basic pension remains as a foundation stone for retirement. Last week's budget provided the biggest increase for another universalist allowance: child benefit. Tony Blair may have signalled his preference for a safety net but for the moment this battle has tilted towards the universalist camp. Ironically, with a government so reluctant to increase tax, the poor will only get extra help if the better-off lose some benefits or existing benefits are better targeted.

There is still plenty to fight for. Nothing is set in stone. Steve Webb, the Liberal Democrat social security specialist, wittily noted yesterday that "Labour never knowingly undercuts its policies". Yet overall, welfare reform, as earlier politicians have discovered, is a hazardous business. Radical welfare reform is needed. Labour is right to tackle dependency and deserves high praise for its huge investment in training and childcare schemes to make its ambitious welfare-to-work schemes succeed. But yesterday's green paper was too short on details, incorporated principles so broad they could encompass both the desirable and totally unacceptable structural changes, and was disappointing in its avoidance of setting unambiguous poverty-reduction targets. Yet debate has only just begun. Radical reforms on pensions, social exclusion, the Child Support Agency, housing benefit, fraud — are on their way. Let the argument begin.

Mitchell's task

Wise men must force the pace

IN A process marked by noise and loud grandstanding, the three independent chairmen of the Northern Ireland peace talks cut quite a contrast. They are quiet, efficient and virtually unseen. While the antagonists use every break in negotiation to stride up to the cameras permanently encamped outside Stormont Castle — often undermining all the good work they have just done inside — the three statesmen keep their counsel. Former US Senator George Mitchell, retired Canadian general John de Chastelain and the Finnish ex-prime minister Harri Holkeri have won plaudits from all those following the peace process. None has been accused of bias — a remarkable achievement in the partisan climate of Northern Ireland. None has sought to play the hero. Instead they have been content to work behind the scenes, enabling the players themselves to settle their differences. They enjoy respect and even affection: Mr Holkeri apologises for his English — his fourth language — but jokes that he has picked up a nice line in Anglo-Saxon insult since taking up semi-residence in Belfast.

Now, though, the time has come for these three very wise men to roll up their sleeves and get stuck in. Senator Mitchell is quite right: "The time for discussion is over. It's now time for decision." He's equally right to suggest the Belfast crowd could happily carry on talking for two if not 20 years: some would say they've been at it for more than four centuries already.

Yet simply demanding the disputants wrap up an agreement by Good Friday might not be enough. The sleep-deprivation strategy — insisting the parties meet all day, all week, until they settle — is smart, but still lacks that extra bit of push. What's needed is for Senator Mitchell and his colleagues to step forward. They need to get out of the metaphorical chair, stop facilitating and start steering this long, tortuous process to completion. That might mean annoying a few people: knocking heads together usually does. But George Mitchell is a seasoned deal-maker: as senate majority leader, brokering honest compromise was his stock-in-trade. He needs to call on all those skills now so that he, along with his two distinguished colleagues, win not just affection — but the gratitude of a people desperate for peace.

Quality Streets

Lifelong learning for wardens

EVEN the most velvet-tongued of Whitehall spin doctors would be pushed to raise the image of traffic wardens. They occupy a place in society lower even than estate agents. There is something about them taking out their note pads to book you for leaving your car on a yellow line that brings out the worst in people who are otherwise sane and law abiding. The fact that in some areas they have been privatised will hardly improve the simmering rage within.

The meanness of wardens is now big business. The fierce example of Westminster Council — reported to have raised over £21 million from a purge on illegal parking — is being copied by other cash-hungry councils believing they have found a modern philosopher's stone. The image of wardens will hardly improve if they have to extract yet more money from reluctant motorists. What can be done? Enter the National Vocational Qualification. Yesterday the British Parking Association (representing them not us) announced a new NVQ to teach wardens the arts of being cool in emergencies and defusing volatile situations (while putting the ticket on with the other hand). If they can do that the NVQ should be elevated to degree status. They would truly have a way of turning base passions into gold.

Letters to the Editor

Lessons of the Lawrence case

PAUL Foot suggests the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry should take account of cases such as Allison Moore's (Racist terror at the door, March 24). Sir William Macpherson's Inquiry is in two parts. It is presently concentrating on the matters which arose directly from the murder of Stephen Lawrence in 1993. The second part to examine the lessons to be learned for the future investigation and prosecution of racially motivated crime, provides an ideal opportunity for other cases to be considered. Stephen Wells, Secretary to the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry, London.

SARAH Boswell continues to perpetuate the myth (Selling The Miracle, G2, March 25) that the "pierced and tattooed" Kathy Acker chose to undergo nascent surgery as an expression of what she called her body art. It seems difficult for some commentators to let go of the glib notion that Acker sacrificed her life for post-human rebel chic. The rather more mundane fact is Kathy Acker sacrificed her breasts because she wanted to live. Charles Shaar Murray, London.

PENELOPE Fitzgerald does not write "gentle historical fiction" (In a literary star, so no irony, March 25) and I don't think anyone would dream of saying so if she were a young man of 30 instead of an old woman in her eighties. She writes astonishing, brilliant, sharp, funny, tragic and powerful books that are very short and entirely wonderful. Liz Mandeville, Lewes.

WAS your report (Saddam Anthrax plot warning, March 24) eight days premature? Peter Lack, London.

Beating about the bush

FRIEDRICH Schlegel may be technically correct about Shakespeare's open use of our "unlovely monosyllables" (Letters, March 26), but the bard was not averse to using imagery just as rude as the use of "fuck" appears to be. To Mr Blunkett, no GCSE student of Hamlet will miss the thinly disguised C-word in "do you think I meant country matters?" Nor do year-9 Sets students miss the "prick of noon" in Romeo and Juliet. Shakespeare could not have used the F-word because it apparently was not introduced into English (from Dutch) until the 17th century, when it primarily meant "to beat". There was a bird named the windfucker in 18th-century ornithological texts. The sexual connotations seem to have arisen soon after in line with the use of the word "bang" for the same activity. Would Blunkett have the same objection to a play called Shopping and Banging? Anthony Purcell, Chelmsford.

ALTHOUGH Shakespeare may not have used any "unlovely monosyllables" directly, he alluded indirectly but unmistakably to several: "Then came each actor on his swart (black), 'These are her C's, her U's, and her T's and thus makes she her great P's".

(Twelfth Night): "Pistol's cock" (Henry V); and so on. Nicholas Walter, London.

TOOK Fritz Spiegl's advice and cut a Granny Smith in half from the top. Did he really mean that Shakespeare's Juliet had five black pipes and a maggot inside her? John Sheeran, Cheltenham.

FRIEDRICH Schlegel is rocky on mediocrity. According to Jane Grigson their ancient name was "openses", "The French called them powerful chies. The reason is nothing to do with what they reveal when cut open; not easy because of the large seeds. If you look at the base of a medlar fruit where it flowered you will see that dog's arse is an accurate and descriptive name. Shakespeare implies that young women gave it a name more personal to them. Michael Croucher, Bristol.

DAVID Blunkett feels great care needs to be taken before public money is spent on things which push the boundaries of respectability ("Ministers in culture clash, March 24). I presume he would have agreed with the popular opinion of the time that Ibsen's A Doll's House should not have been supported, or that Osborne's Look Back in Anger was pushing "the boundaries of respectability" in 1956. Perhaps he believes that public money should only be spent on cossetting and supporting the cultural status quo and not to challenge the social and political assumptions that thought that was New Labour's mission? What is he going on about? Stephen Daldry, Artistic Director, Royal Court Theatre, London.

SOCIETY wants teachers to criticise obscene and insulting language and accept that obligation. Even playwrights and journalists want their children to be civil and not to swear gratuitously. I object to the title "Shopping and Banging", though I am willing to accept that its content is legitimate. Offensive, aggressive swear words are a form of violence in our society. I urge editors to say: "No, I will not use unacceptable language in my newspaper." Terry Ayres, Cranbourne School, Basingstoke.

Does Mr Blunkett derive his knowledge of Shakespeare from Thomas Bowdler's 1818 edition, The Family Shakespeare? Frank Regan, Cheshire, Cheshire.

Mayor will be chain round our neck

SO THE Guardian has joined in telling us an elected mayor is a good idea. You also conform in giving no evidence for saying so. But there are several grounds for thinking the opposition from Ken Livingstone is justified. An elected mayor would emphasise the worst aspects of our pseudo-democracy — superficial judgments of personalities with whom we are not really familiar and a trivial one-in-5 million vote which makes it hardly worth while to think let alone keep informed. It will also lead to excessive concentration of power on a convenient placeman, and be contrived to confine it to suitably new-unfriendly candidates. It will facilitate corruption. Indeed, the agenda hidden behind the proposal is to reinforce the stranglehold that big business development has over the real interests of the populace. If democracy is so desirable, why do we not have a referendum on the Domes? Simply because that would not be convenient for those making large fortunes from it. Robert Clarke, Birmingham.

Below grade

SO AN average difference of more than one grade per subject in the A-level performance of pupils between independent and comprehensive schools is "tiny" (School fees buy status gain, March 26). But institutionalise those different average scores and there is a big difference between schools scoring an average 16.5 A-level points and 23.1. The nation and many children got value for money from the assisted places scheme, which the Government abolished. Sooner or later the issue of giving low-income families access to excellent schools will have to be revisited. Richard Davison, Independent Schools Information Service, London.

Prison powers

ALTHOUGH prison boards of visitors were stripped of their formal disciplinary powers in 1992 (Letters, March 26), they are still responsible for authorising the segregation of prisoners for periods of longer than three days. BOVs vary greatly, but many simply rubber stamp decisions made by the prison governors. The use of segregation is possibly of more concern than the disciplinary process as it can continue indefinitely with no proper system of appeal, and the effects of long-term segregation are severe. It is perhaps for this reason that prisoners have so little confidence in the watchdog role of BOVs. Simon Creighton, Prisoners' Advice Service, London.

Bully the boarding schools to cut down misery and fear

I WAS at a secondary boarding school for four years and recognise much of what George Monbiot describes in his article (Brutality in the dorm, March 26). But he fails to mention that school authorities seldom take bullying as seriously as they do other offences.

At my school, one boy was expelled and another suspended for possessing small amounts of cannabis. Yet boys were allowed to assault others for no reason other than that these others were "mouthy". Moreover, they would get away with these assaults. It appeared that the worst one could do was to offend against a particular set of middle-class, middle-England values. It didn't seem to matter how one treated other boys, as long as one didn't forget to call teachers "sir" and to stand when they walked into a room. But I would not advise that we close down all boarding schools. There are residential special schools, including those for the handicapped, which do valuable work. For the rest, however, boarding schools are thoroughly reactionary and have skewed priorities. They inculcate respect for authority though not respect for people as people. It is these institutions that ought to be abolished. Matthew J Smith, Aberystwyth.

WHY is it that George Monbiot is a voice crying in the wilderness? If the intimidation and violence that are just accepted as ordinary life in boys' boarding schools went on in children's homes, there would be a national outcry. Let's leave the clean-up on the streets till later. If we really want to make the massive cuts in misery and fear in society now, let's go for zero tolerance in boarding schools. John Evans, Southampton.

Prague Writers' Festival 1998

The 8th Prague Writers' Festival presents a selection of fine authors from the Czech Republic and around the world. Meet them at the Franz Kafka Centre, Old Town Square, at 7 pm from 20 to 25 April.

Monday 20 April	Lawrence Ferlinghetti	City Lights
	Antigone Kefau	Australia
	Michael March	USA
	Josef Topol	Czech Republic
Tuesday 21 April	Martin Amis	British Day
	Brian Patten	Great Britain
	Per Olov Enquist	Sweden
	Isabel Fonseca	USA
Wednesday 22 April	Pedro Tamen	Portuguese-Language Day
	Mário Souza	Portugal
	Mia Couto	Brazil
	Germano Almeida	Mozambique
	Tahar Ben Jelloun	Cape Verde
	Miroslav Holub	Morocco
Thursday 23 April	Lilian Faschinger	Czech Republic
	Robert Menasse	Austrian Day
	Claudio Magris	Austria
	Ludvík Vaculík	Italy
Friday 24 April	Robert Creeley	Czech Republic
	John Banville	For Bohumil Hrabal
	Dante Marijanacci	USA
	Rhea Galanaki	Ireland
	Mila Haugová	Greece
	Viera Prokešová	Slovakia
	Daniela Fischerová	Slovakia
Saturday 25 April	Ryszard Krynicki	Czech Republic
	Andrzej Szczypiorski	Polish Day
	György Petri	Poland
		Hungary

The Festival is dedicated to Bohumil Hrabal. Patron: the City of Prague. For further details, please contact the Prague Writers' Festival Foundation, Staroměstské nám. 22, Prague 1 tel/fax + 420 2 24 21 30 30

Sponsored by The Guardian INTERNATIONAL

Up Yours (and Yours)

Bel Littlejohn

WE got one helluva lot of time for Jim Boyce, the dynamic and far-sighted new boss of the new look Radio 4. He's dusted off a lot of cobwebs, blown away a lot of loose baggage and ironed a huge number of shirts — and he's come up with a brilliant new schedule that's not only radical but reforming as well. His changes are far-reaching and all-embracing. Desert Island Discs is to be increased by 10 minutes. Today is to run an extra half-hour. Instead of the daily arts programme Kaleidoscope, there's a brand new programme, Scope, that promises to take a fresh daily look at the arts. We're talking brave, we're talking bold, we're talking shake-up. And that's not all. Start the Week and Midweek have been given a thorough repackaging by reducing the number of guests from five to four and, in a typically bold twist, keeping on their original presenters.

But boldest and most far-reaching of all is the new, thoroughly revamped consumer rights prog You and Yours, to be presented by someone with a proven track record of years of experience in the field, namely myself. It will now run to an hour every day — far-reaching change reflected in its new look title:

You and Yours and Yours and Yours. We aim to include the very best from all the other consumer and minority programmes of recent years, among them (sub check) for the hard of hearing. All Steamed Up for people who are suffering from faulty kettles, saucers or other kitchenware problems. Most Go Now! the five-minute slot for people who suffer from compulsive phone-in disorder, and At Issue, the lively magazine programme for sufferers from the common cold.

We unveiled the first in the new series of You and Yours and Yours and Yours in a special presentation in the Serpentine Gallery yesterday. Why the Serpentine? Because it is situated in London's Hyde Park, the subject of a major special investigation in the months ahead. As I explained to the assembled media yesterday, we were first alerted to the perils lying in wait for the unwary Hyde Park consumer by a post bag of letters from ordinary listeners, such as Mrs EB Clegg from Knebworth, Herts.

Mrs Clegg explained that she has an occasional allergy to grass. "The last time I visited Hyde Park," she continued, "I was shocked and horrified by the amount of grass that the authorities let grow there, without any apparent concern for the safety of those of us who suffer from medical allergies. I saw no warning signs at all, and no skilled medical staff at hand to deal with the consequences of the authorities' stubborn indifference to the plight of a sorely tried section of the community."

On closer investigation, we were to discover that an undisclosed number of other citizens had their own horror stories about this park. Mr D Ranken of Bootle telephoned our Emergency Complaint

Hotline to inform us that, in the process of conducting his own personal researches, he had come across a very large stretch of lake-edge water in Hyde Park. "There were no signs to tell the public — including many under-age kiddies — that this water was unsuitable for drinking," he pointed out. "Nor had the relevant authorities made any provision whatsoever for those pedestrians, who might wish to walk across this sizeable stretch of water. I can only imagine the distress this provoked like might cause an elderly lady with a faulty hip as she attempted to take a short cut across the park, only to find herself knee-deep in damp water. The Government must bring in immediate legislation to resolve this urgent matter for once and for all."

Ms P Roberts from Solihull was similarly concerned about the "quite appalling"

number of large trees she had observed standing entirely stationary in Hyde Park, many of them with potentially lethal foliage. "A leaf is a potential killer. As few as six to seven soggy leaves blown by the wind through the open mouth and into the throat of an otherwise able-bodied human being can choke him or her to death, with heavy funeral expenses not to mention legal bills for the rest of his grieving family."

In response to these deeply upsetting letters, we on the new look You and Yours and Yours and Yours today launch a hard-hitting ParkAlert campaign to draw the attention of ordinary citizens to your statutory rights if and when you suffer untold damage from public parks up and down the country. For this and all the other grim warnings you may require I urge you: stay tuned.

Daniel Massey

An actor for all seasons

DANIEL MASSEY, who has died aged 64 of Hodgkin's Disease, was an actor of extraordinary grace, wit and aristocratic charm: a natural high comedy player at home in Shaw, Wilde or Pinero. But he was also capable of sounding tragic depths, as he showed in his unforgettable portrayal of the conductor, Wilhelm Furtwängler, in Ronald Harwood's Taking Sides.

He was born into the, as it were, theatrical purple. His parents, Raymond Massey and Adrienne Allen, were both distinguished actors and his godfather, and one of the major influences on his life — was Noel Coward. Indeed, at the age of nine, Massey played Coward's son in the wartime film In Which We Serve. And Coward records in his diaries a lunch with the 18-year-old Massey just emerging from Eton: "He is a nice, intelligent boy, but I think inclined to be intense."

That did not, however, prevent him, in his final year at King's College, Cambridge, from appearing in the 1956 Footlights revue, Anything May, whose writers included Michael Frayn and Bamber Gascoigne.

After Cambridge, Massey learned the hard realities of theatrical life by going straight into Agatha Christie's Peril at End House in Worthing. But he avoided the slog round the reps and soon found himself cast in a piece of West End froth, The Happy-Go-Lucky. His career took a radically different turn, however, in 1959 when he went to the Theatre Royal, Stratford East, to play in a Monty Norman/David Heneker musical, Make Me An Offer, based on a Wolf Mankowitz novel.

This is still one of the great, unrecognised post-war British musicals; and I would claim that Massey's lighter-toned rendering of I Want a Lock-up in the Portobello Road is one of the most fluent and graceful things I have heard on the lyric stage.

Massey was in constant demand in the 1960s, most especially in comedy and musicals. He was Charles Surface in Gielgud's glittering Haymarket revival of The School for Scandal, the young tutor in Michael Redgrave's production of A Month in the Country, in the opening season at the Yvonne Arnaud, Guildford, and was back at the Haymarket late in the decade playing Jack Absolute in The Rivals, and John Worthing in The Importance of Being Earnest. He also played the male lead, opposite the great Barbara Cook, in the 1963 Broadway premiere of Jerry Bock's delicate musical, She Loves Me.

'His speaking, a sensuous pleasure in itself, was also a vehicle of character'

But there was always the feeling that he was capable of sterner stuff, and in the 1970s his range began to widen. He and deceiving husband, Robert, in Pinter's Betrayal, the rapacious, patrician Captain in Calderon's The Mayor of Zalamea and, most notably, John Tanner in Shaw's Man and Superman, for which he won a SWET award from the Society of West End Theatres.

As Robert Cushman wrote, his natural musicality stood him in good stead: "His speaking, a sensuous pleasure in itself, is also a vehicle of character."

Massey was always at his peak in Shaw and he returned to the National in 1984 to play the sardonic General Burgoyne in The Devil's Disciple, a perfect study of a man who adopts a pose of ironic languor to disguise his moral outrage at the jobbery and snobbery that led to the loss of the American colonies.

Massey also did much excellent work for the Royal Shakespeare Company in the 1980s. He was an authoritative Duke in Adrian Noble's Measure for Measure, a feudal bar-room philosopher in a rare revival of Seroyan's The Time of your Life and a wonderful lawyer-politician in Harley Granville Barker's Waste, what he conveyed was the sense of a public idealist awakening to the flatness and vacancy of his private life. He also returned to the RSC in 1988 to play, in Ian Judge's revival of Love's Labour's Lost, a Don Adriano wretched in feathery melancholy and faded grandeur.

By then the illness that dogged him in later years was beginning to give his lean, spindly figure a somewhat ravaged look. But he turned even that to brilliant account in his performance as Furtwängler in Harwood's Taking Sides, first in Chichester and then in London. Classical music was, in fact, one of Massey's hobbies and he made you understand Furtwängler's idealistic belief in its power to transform human beings. But he also intelligently suggested that, behind the conductor's passion for music, lurked a guilty awareness of his complicity with a monstrous tyranny. It was, in the words of John Peter, "a majestic and magisterial performance."

Massey made many appearances on television, including an adaptation of Henry James's The Golden Bowl and Christopher Hampton's original TV film, Alfie's Hit. He also pulled off the difficult feat of playing his own godfather in Robert Wise's ill-fated 1983 film about Gertrude Lawrence, Star, for which he was nominated for an Oscar. He went out to Les Avants to study Coward's mannerisms and the original was pleased with the result saying: "Danny Massey is excellent as me, and had the sense to give an impression of me rather than try to imitate me."

Stagestruck... Massey as Argan in Molière's The Hypochondriac. PHOTOGRAPH: NOBBY CLARK

Throughout his career, Massey was an actor of taste and sensibility. But he also seemed to get better and richer with the years as he came to rely less on his thoroughbred charm and more on his skill at delving into character. He had a light voice but a true musical ability to shape a phrase or paragraph, which made him a natural for Shaw and gave his Shakespearean work real colour. Married three times, first to Adrienne Corri, then to Penelope Wilton and, most recently, to her sister, Linda, he was an actor of real class and wide range, who bore his final, wasting illness with dignity and fortitude.

Michael Billington

Daniel (Raymond) Massey, actor, born October 10, 1933; died March 26, 1998

Bernarr Rainbow

Learning to dance to the music of time

BERNARR Rainbow, who has died aged 83, was one of the first researchers to work in the field of the social history of music. But this belies the full richness of his legacy. His stature as a forward-thinking music educator became evident after the war, when he was music master at High Wycombe grammar school for boys; and, for those of us who studied under him as director of music at the College of St Mark and St John in Chelsea, he was a tirelessly committed and infectious enthusiast for the teaching of music.

This was reflected in his first book, Music in the Classroom (1956), which embodied his sense of commitment towards training teachers able to work with his sense of vision and imagination. Within 10 years, he had edited the Handbook for Music Teachers (1964) and had totally revised it by 1970. It became the most used resource document for music teachers for many years.

Rainbow was not yet a graduate, and what we witnessed was his developing academic curiosity, initially manifesting itself in his teaching of the history of baroque music. His chance discovery of papers relating to John Hullah, his predecessor at St Mark's, led to a consuming interest in the social history of music education during the first half of the 19th century, leading to The Land Without Music (1967), for which he was awarded an M Ed at Leicester University. He then worked at lightning speed on The Choral Revival in the Anglican Church 1839-1872 (1970), for which he gained his doctorate in 1967.

In the late 1960s, St Mark's became the focus of avant-garde music curricular developments achieved through Rainbow's insight in building up an influential team of music lecturers, catalysts for changes that would revolutionise the country's music education. A climate began to develop that encouraged music educators to recognise that children's natural musical impulses might be channelled into their own musical improvisations and compositions as a part of general education. And it was during this period that Rainbow met W H Swinburne and a collaboration developed that eventually led to the formation of the Curwen Institute, of which he was first chairman and then president. It was this gathering interest in John Curwen's achievements in tonic sol fa, a form of singing, that integrated Rainbow's academic and pedagogical interests.

After 20 years at Chelsea, he moved to what was then Gypsy Hill College, now Kingston University, and became its head of music, retiring within a few years, although the following two decades were his most academically productive. Music in Educational Thought and Practice (1988) was swiftly followed by Music in the English Public School (1990) and numerous articles, including several in the New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, and chapters in books. He also prepared a series of 25 classic texts in music education, comprising annotated facsimile editions of key 19th century texts.

Rainbow... sense of vision

Fittingly, it was at Trinity College of Music, London, where he had first registered as a part-time student, that, three years ago, he was awarded an honorary fellowship and in 1992, the University of Leicester presented him with the degree of doctor of letters.

Despite his recent stroke, Rainbow relearned the skills of writing and keyboard playing, and was at work on his memoirs when he died. Rainbow, and his wife Olive, whom he outlived by two years, leave no descendants, but his estate is to be invested in the Bernarr Rainbow Award Scheme established to support the postgraduate research of practising music teachers.

Anthony Kemp

Bernarr Rainbow, musicologist, born October 2, 1914; died March 17, 1998

Harold Sumption

Put out the word on poverty

JUST after the war, Harold Sumption, who has died aged 81, wanted to apply his advertising talents to a cause in which he could believe. He placed an ad in the Friend, the Quaker weekly. It got one reply, from Oxford businessman Cecil Jackson-Cole, secretary to a local charity, the Oxford Committee for Famine Relief. It was the beginning of his 35 years' service to what later became Oxfam.

Sumption's early Oxfam advertisements might seem crude by today's standards, but they were effective and revolutionary charity advertising. Deliberately artless, they shocked with their direct depiction of human need.

A Devon farmer's son, his career began in the 1930s with unpaid stunts for a London advertising agency. A wartime conscientious objector, he returned to the advertising world after recovery from tuberculosis. His advertisements for the charity reflected his belief that most people have the instincts of a good Samaritan, but need to be shown with clarity, honesty and urgency why and how they should exercise them. The creative work was underpinned by solid professional disciplines: he introduced coupons so that response could be measured precisely, experimented with "split runs" in newspapers to test the effect of different ads, and constantly assessed new media — from stamps to poster sites — donated at his suggestion.

Little in today's fund-raising repertoire was not tried first by Sumption. The commercial catalogue had their primitive beginnings in Oxford: charity pop promotion started with the Beatles' support of Britain's first successful £1 million appeal, and Oxfam's own show on Radio Luxembourg; and the first use of TV to create a mass popular response was the hard-hitting interrogation of Oxfam by the stars of Z Cars.

He became a trustee of Help the Aged and of ActionAid and Voluntary and Christian Service, while continuing to work in commercial advertising. Under the aegis of N W Ayer, he formed the first British direct-marketing division and helped set up the Monarch International Direct Marketing Symposium.

In 1979, he co-founded the International Fundraising Workshop in Holland, which has become the principal forum for charities and voluntary organisations to exchange their fundraising and marketing experience — an especially useful resource for charities in developing countries. This is a fitting memorial to a man whose vision of international co-operation was a driving force, and whose readiness to advise others was legendary. His legacy is also in the vigour and success of the whole British voluntary sector, which relies still on the fruits of his imagination and wisdom.

Sumption was a modest, quiet man, whose gifts touched individuals and organisations with lasting effect. His beloved wife, Ruth, whom he met at a Friends' meeting and married in 1938, died in 1987. They are survived by a son and daughter.

John Hambley

Harold Sumption, advertising executive and fund-raiser, born November 16, 1916; died March 18, 1998

A Country Diary

GLOUCESTERSHIRE: An envelope from Maff dropped through our letterbox at The Droppings last week. Headed "Clean livestock — everyone's responsibility", it focused on cleanliness in the meat supply chain, and I could not disagree with a word. Clearly BSE and E. coli have concentrated minds wonderfully in parts where they never get dug out during the High Court action brought against Dyno-Rod by Rentokil. The information referred to was temporarily and inadvertently lost. This was accepted by the court and should be because it is part of the annual cycle. Next weekend, they will all get their heptaxovax injection too. Hermit, who always lambasts first, was clearly in trouble and her condition was directly relevant to the matters addressed by the mailing on clean livestock. The start of the worm cycle, probably early this year, meant that she showed signs of an abdominal worm burden and was soiled in her poor condition. We dosed her two mornings running with the blue drench, which is the most dependable stopper and, with the rest of the flock, she also got 7ml of panacur, which is usually a dependable worm control with seven-day limits on human consumption of both meat and milk, relevant only to the small numbers of cheese-makers who use ewes' milk in an effort to emulate Roquefort. Cleaning an ewe that is heavily dung-soiled is a job which takes soap, water, daggings and 15 minutes of your time. I wonder if the authors of the Maff leaflet know the malodorous reality of the care they counsel?

COLIN LUCKHURST

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

DYNO-ROD: An item in a News in brief column, headed Dyno-Rod men admit concealing evidence, Page 19, March 24, contained a number of errors, the most serious of which was reflected in the headline. The two men involved did not admit having concealed any evidence during the High Court action brought against Dyno-Rod by Rentokil. The information referred to was temporarily and inadvertently lost. This was accepted by the court and it was for this that Dyno-Rod tendered an apology. Dyno-Rod is not a US company. It was founded in Britain in 1983. The company director referred to in the report is Clive Smith, not Chris Smith. The total paid by Dyno-Rod to Rentokil in damages and costs, in an out-of-court settlement, was £12 million. We would like to apologise to Dyno-Rod for the mistakes in this report.

A CAPTION on Page 7, March

19, referred to the opening of the Yves St Laurent Room at the National Gallery. His surname is Saint Laurent. The Saint should never be abbreviated.

IN OUR Commons sketch, Page 2, March 20, the words, "The danger will be in the juices!" were attributed to Jack Cunningham. They were, in fact, uttered by Jeff Rooker.

It is the policy of the Guardian to correct errors as soon as possible. Readers may contact the office of the Readers' Editor, Jan Moyes, by telephoning

Birthdays

Robert Bauman, chairman, British Aerospace, 67; Sir Louis Blom-Cooper QC, barrister and author, 72; Lord Callaghan of Cardiff, former Labour prime minister, 80; Maria Ewing, opera singer, 48; Duncan Goodhew, swimmer, 41; Mstislav Rostropovich, cellist and conductor, 71; Admiral Sir Jock Slater, First Sea Lord, 60; Prof Margaret Stacey, sociologist, 78; Quentin Tarantino, film director, 35; Cyrus Vance, US statesman, 81; Terry Yorath, football manager, 48.

0171 239 9588 between 11am and 5pm, Monday to Friday. Fax: 0171 239 9897. E-mail: reader@guardian.co.uk

Death Notices

OTOOLE, Thomas, suddenly on 23rd March 1998, aged 83, husband of Sheila and son of John and Mary OTOOLE, of 37, St. Mary's, on Tuesday 31st March at 13.00. Family flowers only please, donations to British Heart Foundation, c/o Green 12 544.

FREE WITH COMPUTER SHOPPER

FREE WITH MAY ISSUE
ON SALE NOW

FREE WITH JUNE ISSUE
ON SALE 30th APRIL

World exclusives from Computer Shopper and Microsoft with fully-working versions of these two top-selling CD-Roms.

Microsoft Encarta 98 Encyclopedia Deluxe British Edition (Fully working 21-day version).

Microsoft Encarta World Atlas 98 Edition (Full product 30-day version).

PLUS each issue includes a discount voucher for £10 OFF of the full Microsoft products.

BUY BETTER BY FAR WITH COMPUTER SHOPPER.

BRITAIN'S BIGGEST SELLING COMPUTER MAGAZINE

PolyGram rocked by late albums

THE unpredictability of creative artists like All Saints (pictured) caused PolyGram to warn yesterday that first quarter profits will be savaged, writes Lisa Buckingham.

A number of its top acts have failed to issue albums. Although the Motown 40th anniversary compilation album has hit the streets, the first three months' results will hardly benefit from the delayed releases of All Saints and Pulp. In contrast, this time last year PolyGram released a D2 album which sold 5 million copies and also had another clutch of million-plus sellers. The investors' kneejerk reaction wiped 11 per cent from the company's value. Only last month, when PolyGram unveiled its 1997 profits, chief executive Alan Levy predicted the group would manage to shrug off the worst of the Asian crisis. But yesterday, he said that, although sales levels would be in line with last year's strong first quarter, profits would be "sharply lower". He admitted that provisions for bad debts in Asia had been increased. Mr Levy did caution last month that the group's recent performance suggested that full year results would be lower than last year's $368 million.

weighted towards the end of the year. Yesterday he said that nothing in the group's recent performance suggested that full year results would be lower than last year's $368 million.

Major saw the poverty gap cut

Rowntree report overturns conventional belief on trend, Mark Atkinson writes

THE gap between rich and poor started to narrow in the last few years of the Tory Government, according to a report due out next week.

The report, to be published by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, will disclose that the trend towards widening income inequality established during the Thatcher years of the 1980s started to go into reverse during John Major's administration.

"The eighties have stopped," said the report's author, John Hills, head of the London School of Economics' centre for the study of social exclusion.

Although the new figures for 1995-96 are not seen as conclusive proof that the long term trend toward rising inequality is over, they are certain to fuel criticism of the assumptions underpinning government policy, and underline the need for accurate statistics on which to base social policy.

In the Government's Green Paper on welfare, published yesterday, the Prime Minister said rising inequality, along with fraud and work disincentives, was one of the three main reasons requiring reform of the present system.

Conservative employment spokesman David Willetts, commenting on the Rowntree report, said: "It looks as if Labour's worst policies rest on a false premise and that income differentials are narrowing." He added: "This also calls into question some of the more ambitious theories about globalisation driving widening income differentials."

The Government believes that globalisation and rapid technological change have indeed increased the wages on offer to skilled workers at the expense of unskilled labour.

Next week's report is an update of the foundation's Inquiry into income and wealth, published amid intense controversy in February 1995.

The original report discovered that the gap between rich and poor grew dramatically after 1977, becoming wider than any recorded since 1945.

It found that between 1979 and 1992 the poorest 20-30 per cent of the population failed to benefit from economic growth despite the supposed "trickle-down effect" in contrast to the earlier post-war period.

The growth of such inequality was faster in the UK than in any other country except New Zealand.

The inquiry team — which included the then head of the Confederation of British Industry, Howard Davies — found multiple causes for the gap, including more dependence on benefits for single parents and unemployed people, and a widening difference between earnings and benefits income.

Orange sale sets up BAE

David Gow
Industrial Editor

BRITISH Aerospace yesterday drove into pole position to lead the shake-out in Europe's defence industry by raising $764 million for acquisitions through the sale of the bulk of its stake in Orange, the mobile phone network.

BAe, already sitting on a cash-pile of $750 million, is expected to net up to $500 million extra later this year by offloading its property development arm, Arlington, as it concentrates its activities on its core civilian and military aerospace business.

BAe's move came just days before it, France's state-owned Aérospatiale and Germany's Dasa, Europe's three premier companies, are due to submit a joint plan to restructure Europe's civilian and military aerospace industry to their respective governments.

The three are still battling over the trilateral plan and City analysts cautioned yesterday against expectations of a swift European realignment on the scale of the recent mergers in the US, even though BAE's chief executive Sir Dick Evans is a long-standing protagonist of the pan-European defence company.

Company executives similarly point out that if American defence firms are chasing $250 billion a year in Pentagon contracts while 45 European companies are fighting for a budget half the size.

"BAe is bound to look to Europe for growth but it's not the only game in town," said Peter Caldwell of Nikko Europe. "If things are progressing too slowly there are other irons in the fire, notably in the US."

TOURIST RATES — BANK SELLS

Australia 2.429	Germany 2.964	Malaysia 6.04	Singapore 2.63
Austria 2.096	Greece 523.60	Malta 0.641	South Africa 8.11
Belgium 61.35	Hong Kong 12.61	Netherlands 3.348	Spain 261.45
Canada 2.202	India 85.22	New Zealand 2.50	Sweden 19.01
Cyprus 0.885	Ireland 1.182	Norway 12.34	Switzerland 2.454
Denmark 11.43	Israel 6.01	Portugal 304.05	Turkey 385.010
Finland 9.133	Italy 2.559	Saudi Arabia 5.18	USA 1.088
France 9.97

Supplied by NatWest (excluding Russia, Israel and India)

Investors dial up big profits

Nicholas Bannister looks at the rich rewards reaped from the phone market

EARLY investors in mobile phone companies have made a killing as operators have seen spectacular growth over the past several years.

British Aerospace paid $55 million for its 21.12 per cent holding in Orange. The 5 per cent stake it is retaining after yesterday's $764 million share sale is itself worth about $237 million. But it is not alone in reaping rich rewards. Vodafone, the country's largest mobile operator, quickly outgrew its parent, the Rascal defence electronics business.

Rascal raised $320 million by floating 20 per cent of Vodafone in 1988. In 1991 the rest of the Vodafone shares were returned to Rascal's shareholders in what was then Britain's largest corporate demerger. The deal valued Vodafone at about $3 billion — more than the rest of the Rascal businesses put together. Today it has a stock market value of more than $18 billion.

Cellnet, Britain's second largest mobile network, has been a money-spinner for Securicor, which floated $4 million in 1994 in return for a 40 per cent stake. Analysts estimate that Securicor could now raise between $1.6 billion and $2 billion if it sold its Cellnet shares.

British Telecom, which owns the rest of Cellnet, would love to buy them but is prevented by current legislation. Securicor is prepared to sell if the price is right. It is not happy that Cellnet, which now represents the bulk of its business, is managed by BT.

Cable & Wireless and US West each invested about $500 million in One 2 One, the Hong Kong group that launched Orange.

Standard Life Annual General Meeting

The 172nd Annual General Meeting of the Standard Life Assurance Company will be held in Standard Life House, 30 Lothian Road, Edinburgh on Tuesday 28 April 1998 at 2.30pm.

A member entitled to attend and vote is entitled to appoint a proxy to attend and vote. A proxy need not be a member.

By order of the Board of Directors
Marcia Campbell
Secretary
Edinburgh, 26 March 1998

Policyholders may obtain a copy of the Annual Report and Accounts, including the agenda, by writing to the Customer Service Information Team at PO Box 141, 1 Tanfield, Edinburgh EH3 5RG or by telephoning 0845 60 60 070. Proxy forms may be similarly obtained by members entitled to vote.

was then Britain's largest corporate demerger. The deal valued Vodafone at about $3 billion — more than the rest of the Rascal businesses put together. Today it has a stock market value of more than $18 billion.

The UK Index-tracking PEP

Highest

* The All-Share Tracking PEP that's charged the least, has performed the best.

0500 11 66 22

Legal & General

The Interest Free Time Machine

The new 233M-2 Time Machine includes everything you want in a home PC and delivers higher performance than our 233-2 Pentium II processor based system — all at a truly incredible price of just £1099 + VAT.

With Interest Free Credit spread over 2 years with easy monthly payments of just £28 per month, you will not find a better deal anywhere. Buy it Now!

Order early this week and claim your FREE Epson Stylus Colour Inkjet printer. Offer limited to first 1000 orders.

£28 Per Month

2 Years Interest Free Credit 0% APR

FREE PRINTER Offer
- limited to first 1000 orders only.
Please contact 0800 77 11 07 or 0800 77 11 07

£1099 £1291.33

233M-2 TV Model £39
As above but with 8.4" colour screen, 640K RAM, 12" screen (17" £499 + VAT = £778.00) and PC system with 128MB RAM and 3.5" floppy drive. Includes FREE higher spec Epson 400 colour printer. Please contact 0800 77 11 07 or 0800 77 11 07

266M-2 TV Model
As 233M-2 TV model but with faster 66MHz Pentium processor with MMX Technology. Larger 4.0GB hard disk + FREE higher spec Epson 600 colour printer. Only £189 + VAT = £233M-2 TV model. Please contact 0800 77 11 07 or 0800 77 11 07

FREE EPSON COLOUR PRINTER
First 1000 orders only
Epson Stylus 300 colour inkjet printer. 600 dpi. 128MB RAM. 3.5" floppy drive. PC cable. 233M-2 TV model comes with higher spec Epson 400 printer. 233M-2 TV model with Epson 600 1400 dpi printer.

Time Machine GT Bundle Only £399 + VAT = £518.33
200 leading CD hits with RPP over £500. Only available with Time Machine! Please call 0800 77 11 07

42 UK Showrooms
Other Time Showrooms

FreePhone Time Now!
0800 77 11 07
Sales Lines Open Monday - Friday 8.30am-7.00pm, Saturday 9.00am-5.00pm
All offers end 28th March

TIME COMPUTER SYSTEMS

Tomorrow: The aroma of fresh coffee spreads

Plus: Record results? Buy a painting

Financial Editor: Alex Brummer
Telephone: 0171-239-9610
Fax: 0171-833-4456

FinanceGuardian

Asia stops buying British • Trade gap balloons • Pound at nine-year high Recession clouds horizon

Larry Elliott
and Mark Atkinson

FEARS that Britain's hard-pressed manufacturing sector is on the brink of recession were fuelled as the spring and summer exports to South-east Asia sent the trade deficit ballooning last month.

Today the Confederation of British Industry warns of "clouds darkening the economic horizon" on news that exports to Thailand, South Korea and Malaysia halved over the past year.

Michael Saunders, economist with Salomon Smith Barney, said the loss of markets in crisis-torn Asia, combined with a 9 per cent jump in imports since early 1997, means "the trade balance with these countries has risen by about £150 million per month from a year ago, adding to the squeeze from the high pound".

With sterling shrugging off the figures and surging to a nine-year high last night of 3.0746 German marks, Treasury officials admitted that they are unable to bring any respite to exporters through a cheaper currency.

Figures from the Office for National Statistics yesterday showed that last month Britain was in the red to the tune of £1.6 billion with countries outside the European Union. This was double the deficit expected by the City and the largest shortfall on record.

Taking a pounding

Part of the worsening trend was due to one-off trade in so-called erratic items such as precious stones and aircraft, but ONS officials said the underlying picture was of a widening deficit.

port volumes, by contrast, are rising steadily. Sudhir Jomankar, the CBI's associate director of economic analysis, said: "These are difficult times for British manufacturers."

"Sterling's continued strength and concerns about the impact of the Asian economic crisis are undoubtedly having a dampening effect on export demand."

Factories are cutting prices to find customers for their goods, according to today's CBI monthly industrial trends survey.

Only 22 per cent of manufacturers say their order books are above normal for the time of year, against 24 per cent who report that they are below par. Export order books provide an even gloomier picture, with just 14 per cent of firms saying they are above normal against 45 per cent saying they are below normal.

Treasury officials giving evidence yesterday to the Commons Treasury select committee hearing on the Budget acknowledged that there was a risk of manufacturing sliding into recession this year.

Chancellor Gordon Brown's forecasts are for industrial output to rise at best by 0.5 per cent in 1998, but Christopher Kelly, the Treasury's head of economic briefing and analysis, conceded that the outcome could be worse.

"We are not forecasting manufacturing recession but it must be a possibility... Manufacturing is going through a difficult period. Activity or growth this year will be weak or virtually non-existent and therefore it could be above or below zero. We can't rule it out."

Notebook

Share price cut makes a poor fit

Edited by Mark Milner

NEXT'S management must be feeling very bruised this morning.

Yesterday it went to the City with a modestish mass culpa. This season at least it should have been better sticking to its classic lines than ostensibly more fashionable wear.

It had under-ordered best-selling lines. As a result profits would be down. But this was just a hiccup. Come autumn it would be business as usual.

City reaction was savage, however. More than £650 million was wiped off Next's stock market value. It could get worse. Unless the price picks up, Next will drop out of the Footsie 100. That would mean selling from funds which track the index.

Some of yesterday's response must have been driven by worries that Next's problems run deeper than the fickleness of fashion. There are genuine concerns that the economy will slow and with it high street spending. The company's late-1990s post-boom problems may have added to City jitter.

Nonetheless, a £1.57 fall in the share price in a single day looks excessive. If fundamentals not fashion were the issue, why so precipitate a reaction? Such a fall looks like sudden panic, not a considered response to a developing situation.

It is hard to avoid concluding that anyone who punctures the present stock market euphoria is in for a hammering. And that the Sets trading system tends to exaggerate price movements. Even so, that was some hiccup.

In the balance

BITAIN'S balance of payments is tipping in the wrong direction. February's trade deficit with countries outside the European Union was a whopping £1.6 billion, the largest on record. As the Confederation of British Industry put it yesterday, there are clouds darkening the economic horizon.

Yesterday's figures provide a graphic illustration of the impact of the financial crisis in Asia last year. Then the headlines were grabbed by tumbling stock markets and collapsing currencies. Now the impact of the crisis is rushing through into real economies. Economic activity in the region is slowing so too is Asia's appetite for imports. Britain's sales to Thailand and South Korea have halved. But Britain's trade problems are not confined to Asia. Looming ever larger is the strength of the pound. A growing trade deficit should have a depressing effect on sterling. Tell that to the foreign exchange markets. Yesterday sterling was above DM3.07. Not only does that make exports expensive, it makes imports cheaper, too.

Copper rogue jailed for 8 years

Jonathan Watts in Tokyo

ROGUE trader Yasuo Hamanaka began an eight-year prison sentence yesterday for his pivotal role in the $2.6 billion Sumitomo copper scandal. Hamanaka — who once dominated world trading in the red metal — had pleaded guilty to charges of fraud and forgery.

His unauthorised deals threatened the existence of Sumitomo and created chaos in the copper market, according to presiding Judge Yoshitomi Asayama.

Hamanaka's activities dwarfed those of speculator Nick Leeson, whose $800 million-plus secret gambles brought down Barings Bank in 1995, and embroiled in scandal the London Metal Exchange, through which the Sumitomo trader carried out many of his deals.

Judge Asayama said: "He used every means to conceal his unauthorised deals... It was a vicious, complex crime." The discovery of Sumitomo's enormous losses in June 1996 set alarm bells ringing about commodities regulation and caused the price of a tonne of copper to plunge within a month from $2,800 to $1,750, from which it has yet to recover.

When the scandal broke, Hamanaka, who lived in a Tokyo suburb, was described as an unlikely perpetrator of one of the biggest financial scandals in history. Colleagues called him a quiet man who was devoted to his company and his family.

The court heard, however, that, as well as conducting covert trades over 11 years from 1985, the 50-year-old enjoyed gambling and stashed hundreds of thousands of dollars in a Swiss bank account.

Claims that Sumitomo and Hamanaka conspired with other firms to manipulate international copper prices are still under investigation in Britain and the United States.

Sumitomo president Kenji Miyahara described the sentence as fair and appropriate. In February, the company filed a civil lawsuit against Hamanaka and his former boss, Saburo Shimizu, seeking 736 million yen (£3.3 million) in damages.

Judge Asayama was scathing in his comments about Sumitomo's weak internal supervision, however, saying the company failed to avert the crisis because it put too much emphasis on profits.

Hamanaka's lawyers, who had sought a lenient sentence on the grounds that Sumitomo's risk-management system was also at fault, said they were considering an appeal.

Another member of the London Metal Exchange received a $50,000 fine yesterday for failing to report large holdings purchased between October 1996 and June last year. The Exchange's Disciplinary Committee said Deutsche Sharp's Plakay Metals Ltd breached rules by neglecting to report the holding and failing to train properly staff involved in the transactions.

Judgment day... Yasuo Hamanaka, flanked by lawyers, enters Tokyo District Court for sentencing

Anger as managers clean up in Thames Trains buy-out

Government powerless to prevent bonanza. KEITH HARPER reports

ANOTHER privatised rail company was taken over yesterday with the certainty that its senior managers have made big profits from the £6.1 million sale.

Nearly 70,000 £1 shares owned by six managers and staff involved in the buy-out of Thames Trains, which operates local services from Paddington station, are expected to be bought.

Some of the managers will be better off by hundreds of thousands of pounds, while a thousand members of staff will make up to £300 each.

John O'Brien, the rail franchise director, yesterday approved the takeover of the Thames Franchise by the Go-Ahead group. It already has a majority holding in the franchise and will buy back 34.8 per cent of shares held by management and staff.

Mr O'Brien said he had taken the decision to approve after securing commitments for £1 million of improvements. These include a new through service between Oxford and Bristol and improved compensation arrangements.

The deputy prime minister, John Prescott, was sceptical about the deal, but said there was nothing he could do about it. He is concerned about the amount of windfall profits which are falling into the laps of mainly former British Rail managers who were involved in several buy-out schemes during privatisation.

But the Government has no legislation to prevent it and will not act retrospectively. Mr Prescott said he had asked Mr O'Brien to make sure that there was a "significant passenger dividend in any future takeover of a train-operating company. We must make sure the passenger gets the maximum benefit from any future buy-out or takeover deal."

The Thames takeover follows moves earlier this month by the bus and train company FirstGroup, which bought out two rail franchises — Great Western and North West Trains — making millions of several directors.

The buy-back by Go-Ahead will give the company greater control over the trains' business and generate additional benefits from its two franchises in the London region.

The move has been prompted partly by the increasing numbers of people using the railway and the underlying support of the taxpayer through Exchequer grants.

These will dwindle over the next five years as the company reaches the end of its seven-year franchise.

The pressure group Save Our Railways said: "Once again, we have the obscene spectacle of managers of privatised companies being transformed into fat cats, even though they ran a worse service than BR."

"Rail privatisation is revealed once again as being a quick fix to make a fast buck at the taxpayers' expense."

Its campaign director, Jonathan Bray, attacked Mr O'Brien, saying that while he was in charge, rail managers could relax.

"However bad the service, the cheque has always been in the post. Mr O'Brien has rubber-stamped a deal which will make fortunes for a few, while leaving passengers little better off."

Guardian Crossword No 21,233

Set by Fawley

Across

- 1 Mother has request — some kind of rose (6)
- 4 I may be running import/export business (8)
- 9 Having some cognac, ladies recalled TV alien (6)
- 10 Clothes may be odd — orgy's outrageous (8-5)
- 11 Tasse prison staff and be highly persuasive (8,3,6,2)
- 12 Dive, dubious to start with, became disastrously bent (10)
- 14 Grouse as a main course (4)
- 16 Jostle Frenchman in bar, turning round (4)
- 18 Ubiquitous style of carpeting (4-2-4)
- 21 How to use a simple telescope, very easily (4,3,3,4)
- 23 This should stop you encouraging promiscuity (3-5)
- 24 Unduly mob compete to see supporting film (1-5)
- 25 One employed exotic lingerie, mostly to pursue husband (8)
- 26 Extra kinky, and beginning to deprave? (1-5)

Down

- 1 Bird suddenly lost height over the pond (4)
- 2 Native life-form? (7)
- 3 Turning over a set of articles, noticed second ancient symbol (8)
- 5 Reclaim repaired toy — a faithful representation? (7,4)
- 6 Made jokes or kept silent (6)

CROSSWORD SOLUTION 21,232

Solution tomorrow

27 Stuck? Then call our solutions line on 0800 338 228. Calls cost 50p per minute at all times. Service supplied by ATIS

Safety officials threaten to prosecute Railtrack

RAILTRACK has been threatened with criminal prosecution for failing to complete £3 million of repairs on eight miles of the main-line track between Nottingham and Chesterfield, the Health and Safety Executive confirmed last night, writes Keith Harper.

The company has been given until the end of the month to repair 10 problem areas which are intensively used by Midland Mainline and Central Trains passenger services as well as freight trains.

A commitment by Railtrack to replace rotten sleepers and loose fittings on the 90mph stretch of line has not been honoured.

Chris Hall, the HSE's chief inspector of railways in the Midlands, said: "We would never have had this in the days of British Rail. Railtrack has been in business for four years. It is not acceptable to have so many long-term speed restrictions because it is almost inevitable that an accident will occur from driver error sooner or later."

"The HSE felt there was a 'sufficiently serious risk' to the public and train crews to take action. A host of temporary speed restrictions had become almost permanent, Mr Hall said.

Railtrack said last night that the work would be completed on time. It accepted that the line was in poor condition but blamed that on years of under-investment.

The HSE has sweeping powers which it rarely uses. Enforcements are increasing, however. The first such action related to the entire Euston station lay-out and two miles of track. The second came after the derailment of a freight train at Bexley, south London, where Railtrack and its contractors face a fine of thousands of pounds for not repairing faulty track.

APRIL 10 1998